Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Bigham, Q.C., Atherley Jones and H. Greenwood for the defendant.

Sir Frank Lockwood, Q.C., Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Scott Fox for the plaintiff.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Dec. 18, 1895. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this action for libel, the judge directed the jury that the plaintiff, a solicitor, was entitled to charge an institution, of which he was himself both occasionally the solicitor and also a governor—that is, a person intrusted with the government and management of the institution in question—the profit costs which he would have been entitled to charge if he had not filled that character. It is not necessary to consider whether the institution could have given such a consent as would have enabled him to have taken such profit, because I am of opinion that no such consent was, in fact, given; the matter relied on is absolutely irrelevant to such a question. It cannot now be denied that this was a misdirection. The only question, therefore, which we have to deal with is whether, in the language of Ord. 39, r. 6, a substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned at the trial.

I think that there has been a substantial wrong and a miscarriage. I think that there has been a substantial wrong, since I think that the defendant was not permitted to present his case to the jury with the argument that his original complaint was true. This seems to me a substantial wrong, and I am not prepared to say what a jury might think if they were told that the original complaint was itself unfounded, or if they were told that, though the original complaint was well founded, there was excess in the language by which that original complaint was made; but it appears to me that it was, in this case, withdrawing from the jury a question which the defendant had a right to have submitted, a right which was so relevant and important to the discussion that I must say I cannot regard it as a trivial or immaterial matter; and I think it was a miscarriage, as this view was not presented to the jury. What influence such a wrong might have had upon the verdict or upon the amount of damages I am not disposed to consider. The case must be tried again, and I desire to say nothing which can in any way influence the arguments upon the trial which must take place. It is nothing to the purpose to say that the rest of the printed matter complained of as a libel would justify a verdict for the same amount of damages. I absolutely decline to speculate what

A might have been the result if the judge had rightly directed the jury. It is enough for me that an important and serious topic has been practically withdrawn from the jury, and this is, I think, a substantial wrong to the defendant. I do not think it desirable to say what would be my own construction of the rule in other cases not now before me. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, that a new trial should be ordered, and I move
B your Lordships accordingly.

LORD HERSCHELL stated the facts and continued: At the trial it was contended that the plaintiff was, by virtue of the fourth clause of the college's memorandum of association, entitled to receive remuneration for his services, notwithstanding the position he held as vice-chairman of C the council. CAVE, J., adopted this view, and so directed the jury. The Court of Appeal have held that this was erroneous, and I agree with them. I do not think the words relied on have the effect contended for. It is not now in controversy that, if this be so, the plaintiff was not warranted in making a charge for his professional services.

D It is an inflexible rule of the court of equity that a person in a fiduciary position, such as the plaintiff's, is not, unless otherwise expressly provided, entitled to make a profit; he is not allowed to put himself in a position where his interest and duty conflict. It does not appear to me that this rule is, as has been said, founded upon principles of morality. I regard it rather as based on the consideration that, human
E nature being what it is, there is danger, in such circumstances, of the person holding a fiduciary position being swayed by interest rather than by duty, and thus prejudicing those whom he was bound to protect. It has, therefore, been deemed expedient to lay down this positive rule. But I am satisfied that it might be departed from in many cases, without any breach of morality, without any wrong
F being inflicted, and without any consciousness of wrongdoing. Indeed, it is obvious that it might sometimes be to the advantage of the beneficiaries that their trustee should act for them professionally rather than a stranger, even though the trustee were paid for his services. It is clear, however, that CAVE, J., misdirected the jury, and that, as the misdirection cannot be said to have been on a point wholly immaterial, the defendant would have been entitled, prior to the Judicature Act, to a new trial as of right. That Act provides that a new trial shall not be
G granted on the ground of misdirection, unless, in the opinion of the court, some substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned in the trial. The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that there had been no such wrong or miscarriage in the present case. They thought, as I understand, that the nature of the libel was such that the jury would have been entitled to give, and would probably have given, the same verdict, even if the direction of the judge had been the other way.

H If I had thought that the enactment relied on sanctioned dealing with the case in this way, I am far from saying that I should have differed from the conclusion at which they arrived. But I have come, with some reluctance I own, to the conclusion that it does not. The provision is, in my opinion, a very beneficial one, and I should be sorry to say anything to narrow its scope further than the language employed seems to me to render necessary. In cases in which the
I question is what are the facts, or the proper inferences to be drawn from the facts, if the court think that the verdict of the jury is in accordance with the true view of the facts, and of the inferences to be drawn from them, it may be that they would have done right in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground of misdirection, even where the parties had a right to claim that the action should be tried by a jury. But in the case of an action for libel not only have the parties a right to trial by jury, but the assessment of damages is peculiarly within the province of that tribunal. The damages cannot be measured by any standard known to the law, they must be determined by a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, viewed in the light of the law applicable to them. The latitude is very wide. It would often be impossible to say that the verdict was a wrong one, whether the damages were assessed at £500 or £1,000. Where, then, the judge so directs the jury as to lead them to take an erroneous view of any material part of the alleged libel, and this view may have affected their mind in considering what damages they should award, I think that there has been a substantial miscarriage within the meaning of the rule. The court may think, as I might think in the case before your Lordships, that the jury would have given the same damages if the law had been correctly expounded, but this is a mere matter of speculation; it cannot be asserted with the least certainty that they would have done so. The jury have returned their verdict on what they were erroneously led to think was the case, and not on the real case which the defendant was entitled to have submitted to them. I find it impossible to say that the case upon which the jury ought to have adjudicated ever was wholly before them, and that they were allowed to give to all the circumstances which might legitimately have influenced the verdict their due weight. This seems to me to establish that there has been a substantial miscarriage, and that the defendant is entitled to a new trial.

LORD WATSON.—I shall endeavour, without recapitulating the facts of this case, to indicate the considerations which have led me to differ from the conclusion arrived at by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal. The error committed by the judge consisted in his directing the jury that the plaintiff, as a governor of the Yorkshire College, was legally justified in charging and accepting payment of full professional remuneration in respect of services rendered by him to the college in his capacity of solicitor. Your Lordships can entertain no doubt that the plaintiff was neither entitled to charge profit costs in respect of these services nor to retain them when received by him. Such a breach of the law may be attended with perfect good faith, and it is, in my opinion, insufficient to justify a charge of moral obliquity, unless it is shown to have been committed knowingly or with an improper motive. Ord. 39, r. 6, makes it imperative that a new trial shall not be granted on the ground of misdirection, unless, in the opinion of the court, some “substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned in the trial.” I think it is clear that the misdirection given by CAVE, J., at the trial was such as to occasion a miscarriage, in the sense in which that word was understood by the legal profession at the time when the Rules of 1883 were framed. The only question, therefore, which your Lordships have to consider is whether the miscarriage has been substantial within the meaning of the order.

Every party to a trial by jury has a legal and constitutional right to have the case which he has made, either in pursuit or in defence, fairly submitted to the consideration of that tribunal. In the present instance the case made in evidence by the defendant was not submitted to the jury. The whole imputations in his letter of Feb. 26, 1894, which are said to be libellous, arise out of and are strung upon the allegation that the plaintiff's acceptance and retention of full remuneration for the professional services rendered by him to the college were in violation of the law. The text or basis of these imputations was, in point of fact, true; but the case went to the jury on the footing that it was false. It is plain that the judge did not regard its falsity as an immaterial feature of the case which the jury had to consider. He told the jury :

“In my judgment he [i.e., the plaintiff] was not making a profit illegally or improperly, and, if it was not illegal or improper, of course Mr. Ford could not know that it was either, and that does impute to him conduct which, if it were true, would no doubt tend to lower him in public estimation, and properly so tend.”

I have already indicated my opinion that the illegality of the plaintiff's conduct would not necessarily justify a charge of acting improperly, if the impropriety im-

A puted meant anything more than illegality; and I agree with the judges of the Court of Appeal in thinking that, assuming illegality, there are other imputations in his letter which might sustain a verdict against the defendant.

I do not profess to know all the considerations by which juries are influenced in arriving at their verdict; but it does appear to me that, in assessing damages, a jury might reasonably take into their consideration whether the charge upon which libellous imputations were made by way of comment was or was not in itself a libel. In the one aspect, the defendant's letter conveyed a wholly baseless and libellous charge; in the other, a well-founded accusation, followed up by language which conveyed other and libellous imputations. I do not feel myself in a position to affirm that, in each of these cases, the same jury would have awarded the same sum of damages. I could not possibly arrive at that conclusion without first assessing the damages in each case for myself; and that is a duty which, in my opinion, I ought not to undertake in a case like the present. In such a case the assessment of damages does not depend upon any definite legal rule, and is the peculiar function of the jury, by whom the party liable is entitled to have the measure of his pecuniary liability determined. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that there has been a substantial miscarriage within the meaning of Ord. 39, r. 6, and that the case must be remitted for new trial.

C I have purposely abstained from suggesting any general rule applicable to the construction of Ord. 39, r. 6. I doubt the possibility of formulating any rule which would be useful, and I do not doubt the inexpediency of making the attempt. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances. LORD MACNAGHTEN, who is unable to be present, has requested me to state that he concurs in the views which E I have expressed.

LORD MORRIS and LORD SHAND concurred.

Trustee—Unreasonable conduct—Liability for costs thereby incurred.

I A trustee may be honest, and yet from over-caution or some other cause he may act unreasonably, and if his conduct is so unreasonable as to be vexatious, oppressive, or otherwise wholly unjustifiable, and he thereby causes his cestuis que trust expense which would not otherwise have been incurred, he must bear such expense, and it ought not to be thrown on the trust estate or on his cestuis que trust.

The defendant was the trustee of a trust fund and paid the income of the fund to the plaintiff as directed by the testator's will. After some years he was seized with a suspicion that the plaintiff was dead and that the person to whom he had been paying the money was an impostor. He refused to be satisfied with the evidence produced by the plaintiff as to her identity and she was forced to take out an originating summons to compel him to continue to pay her the income of the fund. There were found no grounds for the defendant's suspicions, and he was ordered to pay the costs of the summons. On appeal against the order as to costs,

Held: as the defendant refused to be satisfied as to the plaintiff's identity by evidence which would have satisfied a reasonable man, he must bear all the expenses resulting from his conduct and must pay the costs of the application.

Appeal against an order by NORTH, J., in so far as it directed that the defendant should pay the costs of an originating summons taken out by the plaintiff to compel the defendant to pay the income of a trust fund to her.

Miss Chapman, who died in 1871, by her will bequeathed the income of a fund to her old servant Mrs. Freeman for her life, and after her death to her niece Ann Freeman for her life, with a gift over of the capital to other persons. Of the two trustees of the will, Francis Parker, a barrister, was the acting trustee. He paid the income to Mrs. Freeman during her life. She died in 1876. Parker then paid the income of the fund to Ann Freeman down to 1891, when he began to entertain a suspicion that Ann Freeman whom he had never seen personally was really dead, and that the individual to whom he had been paying the income was an impostor, who had been personating Ann Freeman. He required evidence to be adduced to satisfy him on this point. The evidence which was given, however, failed to satisfy him at all, and he declined to pay the income. Ultimately Ann Freeman took out an originating summons to compel him to do so. It was decided by NORTH, J., that there was no foundation for Parker's suspicions, and that he had acted unreasonably. The learned judge accordingly ordered him to pay the income to the plaintiff and also to pay the costs of the application. Parker now appealed against the order so far as it directed that he should pay the costs.

A The defendant appeared in person.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiff, were not called upon to argue. Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 21, 1895. The following judgments were read.

B LORD HERSCHELL, L.C.—This is an appeal from a judgment of NORTH, J., by which he ordered the defendant to pay over certain dividends and the costs of the proceedings. The appeal is only from the latter part of the order, namely, as to the costs. The defendant contends that not only ought he not to have been ordered to pay the costs, but that he should be allowed to receive them.

The law which, in my opinion, is applicable to the case may be shortly stated.

C I think that a trustee is bound to act reasonably. I do not dissent from the defendant's proposition that what is reasonable must be measured by the responsibility which the law imposes on a trustee. I do not think that a trustee is bound to run any risks. I think that he is entitled to satisfy himself by all reasonable inquiry and investigation, because, if he pays money to any person who is not properly entitled to receive it, he may be held liable. But if he sees risk where D none in fact exists, and if he refuses to be satisfied by evidence which would satisfy all reasonable men, then I think that he must bear all the expenses which his conduct causes, and cannot throw that expense upon any particular beneficiary or upon the trust estate.

The defendant contends that the trustee is the only judge of what is reasonable, and that he is entitled to be satisfied in such a way as he considers proper. I most E entirely dissent from that proposition. The defendant asked how the court could decide whether a trustee had been acting reasonably, and suggested that that point must be left to the trustee himself. But the courts have every day in a variety of cases to determine whether men are acting reasonably; and I can see no ground why they should not determine what is reasonable in the case of a trustee, just as in any other case. So much for the law. I pass now to the facts. [His F LORDSHIP stated the facts and reviewed at some length the evidence which was furnished to the defendant to show that the plaintiff was the real Ann Freeman, and the grounds on which the defendant relied for considering that evidence unsatisfactory. HIS LORDSHIP was of opinion that the evidence in favour of the plaintiff was overwhelming, and that the matters upon which the defendant had based his objections were absolutely of no weight. He did not think that any other G human being would have displayed such phenomenal scepticism. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] One word I will add, as to the defendant's conduct. I do not believe that he acted dishonestly, or that he had any personal ends to serve. I think that it was sheer unreasonableness on his part. Sometimes a man gets an idea into his head and nothing will shake him. That is the case with the defendant.

H The question is: What is to be done? It would be a most lamentable state of the law if the costs occasioned by this unreasonable conduct should fall either on the beneficiary or on the trust estate. I think that the proper order is that the defendant should pay all the costs, to be taxed as between solicitor and client. It may be unfortunate that the defendant, having acted honestly, shall be compelled to pay the costs; but it would be still more unfortunate if they should be I allowed to fall on the beneficiary or on the trust estate. I think that the judgment of NORTH, J., must be affirmed, with costs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [HIS LORDSHIP stated that he had not a word to say against the defendant's honesty, but he thought that the defendant had acted most unreasonably. He continued:] A trustee may be honest, and yet, from over-caution or some other cause, he may act unreasonably; and if, as in this case, his conduct is so unreasonable as to be vexatious, oppressive, or otherwise wholly unjustifiable, and he thereby causes his cestuis que trust expense which would not otherwise have been incurred, the trustee must bear such expense, and it ought not to be thrown on the trust estate or on his cestuis que trust. In my opinion NORTH, J., acted on a right principle. I think that the costs should be taxed as between solicitor and client.

A. L. SMITH, L.J. concurred, adding that, if there was ever a case in which a defendant trustee ought to pay costs, this was the case.

On the application of the plaintiff's counsel, the court ordered the trust fund to be brought into court.

Insurance—Marine insurance—Valued policy—Depreciation in value of thing insured owing to damage—Subsequent total loss by perils insured against—Right of assured to recover as for total loss.

By a valued time policy the plaintiffs insured their ship, valued at £20,000, with the defendants "against the risk of loss or damage by fire and/or explosion." While the policy was in force the ship was driven ashore by perils of the sea and stranded, and while stranded was totally destroyed by fire. By the stranding the vessel was seriously damaged, but was still a ship, capable of being floated and repaired, though at a cost exceeding her repaired value. In an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover a total loss upon the policy,

Held: the valuation in the policy was, in the absence of fraud, binding and conclusive between the parties, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as for a total loss under the policy on the basis of the valuation, notwithstanding the partial loss and depreciation in the value of the ship by the stranding.

Commercial Action tried before MATHEW, J., brought to recover a total loss upon a policy of marine insurance effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants upon the plaintiffs' steamship, the Bawnmore, which was valued in the policy at £20,000.

B The policy was a time policy, remaining in force for the twelve months from May 6, 1895, to May 5, 1896, inclusive, and it was "against the risk of loss or damage by fire and/or explosion," and in the policy the insurers bound themselves to pay to the assured all such damage and loss by fire and/or explosion, not exceeding the sum of £1,000 within seven days after such loss was proved, and that in proportion to the sums subscribed against their respective names. While the policy was in force the vessel was by the peril of the seas driven ashore on the coast of Oregon and was stranded, and while stranded was totally destroyed by fire.

C The plaintiffs claimed as for a total loss under the policy, the ship having been, as they contended, totally lost by the perils insured against, namely, by fire and explosions, which began about Aug. 29, and continued for several days until the ship was, as the plaintiffs alleged, completely gutted. The defendants said that at the time when the fire occurred the ship was already a constructive total loss by the stranding, and they denied their liability on that ground. It was ordered in chambers that the question should be tried as a matter of law on the assumption that the ship when stranded was still a ship capable of being floated and repaired, though at a cost exceeding her repaired value, and upon the argument it was agreed that the case should be dealt with as if the owners were their own underwriters against the perils of the seas which caused the stranding.

Bigham, Q.C., (Leck with him) for the plaintiffs.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton for the defendants.

F Dec. 9, 1895. MATHEW, J., having stated the facts, read the following judgment:—For the plaintiffs, reliance was placed upon the decisions in Barker v. Janson (1) and Lidgett v. Secretan (2). The ship, it was said, though seriously damaged by the stranding, was still capable of being repaired as a ship; and the valuation in the policy was, therefore, binding, notwithstanding the depreciation in her value due to her having been driven ashore. For the defendants it was argued that if the fire had occurred first and the damage had not been repaired, the underwriters would not have been liable; and that no doubt would be so because the assured would not have sustained any loss by the fire. The result, it was said, ought to have been the same in this case. The constructive total loss made a subsequent loss legally impossible; there was, it was said, a merger; and the assured must be treated as if they had been already indemnified, and had received the value of their ship; and therefore, that it was not right that they should be permitted to recover twice over for what was one loss. But if the owners are to be regarded as insurers in respect of the stranding, the doctrine of satisfaction would prevent any such result.

I I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. The loss by stranding would only become total if the assured gave timely notice of abandonment. If none were given, the loss would be a particular average only, and it would seem clear that a partial loss, however serious, would not impair the right of the assured to recover for a subsequent total loss upon the basis of the valuation. Whether the subject-matter of the insurance be ship or goods, the valuation is the amount fixed by agreement by which, in case of loss, the indemnity is to be calculated. When goods are insured, the valuation may be low when the policy attaches, but the value to the owner may be enhanced when the goods have nearly reached their destination by the expenses of transit, etc., nevertheless, the valuation is binding. And again, if the valuation be high, though the goods at the time of loss may be depreciated in value from fall of prices, or the unusual length of the voyage, or other causes for which the underwriter is not liable, the valuation cannot be opened. Neither appreciation nor depreciation, where there is no fraud, will affect the underwriter's liability. In the case of a ship, in the same way, the vessel may, for many causes, be worth much less at the time of loss than the agreed value, but the valuation determines the amount of the indemnity. This has clearly been the law since Shawe v. Felton (3).

I am unable to distinguish such a loss as the present from any other in which, while the subject-matter of the insurance still exists, and there is no ground for suggesting fraud or wagering, the diminution in value is relied upon to exonerate the underwriter from the whole or from part of his liability. It is impossible, as LORD KENYON said in Shawe v. Felton (3), to draw the line between a greater or less diminution of value. I give judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

The rule of law which invalidates a gift to a solicitor unless the donor has previously had competent and independent advice in the matter, is absolute, and no evidence is admissible to rebut the presumption of undue influence which arises from the relationship of the two parties.

Per LOPES and KAY, L.JJ.: The rule is equally applicable to a gift to a solicitor's wife, and the fact that she may be a relative of the donor is immaterial.

B Appeal from a decision of CHARLES, J., at the trial of an action brought to set aside a deed dated Oct. 12, 1892, made between the plaintiff and the defendant Terry, whereby the plaintiff had assigned to him a lease of two houses upon the trusts therein mentioned.

C The plaintiff was a lady, who, at the time of the execution of the deed, was seventy-seven years of age. The defendant Terry was a solicitor. By this deed the plaintiff assigned the lease to him upon trust to pay to herself the rents and profits for her life, and after her death to her elder sister for life, and after her death in consideration of the natural love and affection of the plaintiff towards her niece, the wife of the defendant Terry, upon trust for Mrs. Terry absolutely. The plaintiff's elder sister died before the commencement of this action. The plaintiff

D had no separate advice in the matter of the execution of this deed, which had been drawn by the defendant Terry. Evidence was given at the trial of what led to the preparation of the deed by the defendant Terry, and also as to what occurred at its execution by the plaintiff. On the latter point it was somewhat contradictory. CHARLES, J., at the trial of the action without a jury, refused to set the deed aside. The plaintiff appealed.

E C. L. Attenborough for the plaintiff.
Stephen Lynch for the defendants.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The question raised in this case is whether, by virtue of a definite rule laid down by courts of equity, the court is not bound to set aside a certain deed of conveyance which has been executed by the plaintiff. As regards

F the facts in the case, I take them in truth to be, as I think CHARLES, J., found, that when the plaintiff executed this deed she intended that what she did should have the effect of assigning the property in it to the wife of the solicitor; that she further intended to pass the property in such a way that she should never be able to revoke what she had done; and that the solicitor explained to her fully and fairly at the time the difference between a will and a deed. Not only did she, in my opinion,

G know perfectly well the effect of what she was doing, but I think that no influence was used over her to make her execute the deed. The deed moreover did not, and could not, benefit the solicitor himself. It was simply in favour of his wife, who was the plaintiff's niece, and whom the plaintiff wished to benefit.

But even though these may be the facts of the case, nevertheless by a rule in equity the deed must be set aside because the defendant Terry was a solicitor, and

H he himself drew the deed and was with her when she signed it, and no other solicitor gave any independent advice in the matter to the plaintiff. The rule of equity upon which I give my decision has been laid down by judges of very great authority, and the presumption which arises against the defendant out of his relations towards the plaintiff is one of law which cannot be refuted by any evidence of fact whatever. That is the effect of the rule which has been laid down by LORD ELDON and by

I TURNER, L.J., and they intended it to have that effect. I submit to that rule, though it seems to me an unfortunate one because it may work terrible injustice. But the court is bound by authority, and until that rule be altered or set aside by some higher authority, it must stand as the law. Upon the ground only of that rule of law I think that this appeal must be allowed and the deed set aside.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree that the appeal must be allowed. I am sorry to differ from the Master of the Rolls as to his comments upon any case that comes before the court, but in the present instance I feel compelled to differ from him to some extent. The rule which we must apply here is a hard and fast one, but I do not consider it to be an unfortunate one. It is founded upon public policy, and, though perhaps there may be some hard cases under it, it is, in my opinion, highly beneficial on the whole. I should, therefore, regret to see it altered.

I think that the authorities establish that a gift to a solicitor made by a client who has had no independent advice, while the relationship of client and solicitor exists between them, or while there is any influence over the client arising from that relationship, is invalid. Before such a gift can be considered valid, the relationship of client and solicitor must be wholly at an end. When a case has been shown to be within that rule, no evidence is of any avail to make the gift valid. If a client wishes to make a gift to his solicitor, what the solicitor must do in order to make the gift a valid one is to obtain competent and independent advice for the donor. Some judgments of LORD ELDON have been cited which are strong authorities in support of this rule, but there is also a very valuable judgment of TURNER, L.J., in Rhodes v. Bate (1), which enables us to say whether this rule exists as a hard and fast one. He says (1 Ch. App. at p. 257) :

“I take it to be a well-established principle of this court, that persons standing in a confidential relation towards others cannot entitle themselves to hold benefits which those others may have conferred upon them, unless they can show to the satisfaction of the court that the persons by whom the benefits have been conferred had competent and independent advice in conferring them.”

That, to my mind, clearly establishes the existence of the rule I have alluded to. As to the facts of this case, I must say that I have not come to the same conclusion as the Master of the Rolls. I do not recognise any substantial distinction between a gift to a solicitor and a gift to a solicitor's wife, even though she may be a relative of the donor. Though the gift be to his wife, it is clear that he may benefit largely by it. She might perhaps immediately after receiving the gift hand it on to her husband. But it is unnecessary to say more as to the facts, because I base my decision upon the inflexible rule of equity which applies to cases of this kind.

KAY, L.J.—I agree with the result of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, though I differ entirely from his comments upon the case. It is a rule of public policy which forbids a person under the influence of another from conferring benefits on that person; that is to say, a gift from the one to the other cannot be accepted unless the donor has received good professional advice before the gift is complete. LORD ERSKINE, L.C., in Wright v. Proud (2) used these words (13 Ves. at p. 138) :

“So, independent of all fraud, an attorney shall not take a gift from his client, while the relation subsists; though the transaction may be, not only free from fraud, but the most moral in its nature.”

In Hatch v. Hatch (3) LORD ELDON said (9 Ves. at pp. 296, 297) :

“This case proves the wisdom of the court in saying, it is almost impossible in the course of the connection of guardian and ward, attorney and client, trustee and cestui que trust, that a transaction shall stand, purporting to be bounty for the execution of antecedent duty.”

There is a slight difference between those two judgments, for in the one it is said that an attorney cannot take a gift from his client, while in the other it is said to be almost impossible. But the explanation is given by the judgment of TURNER, L.J., in Rhodes v. Bate (1) where he says that if the gift should be one of a very trifling nature the court will take no notice of the relationship between the donor and donee.

A Nevertheless the rule is a strict one that a gift from a client to his solicitor is bad unless the donor has previously had competent and independent advice. That seems to me to be a most wise rule and eminently calculated to produce justice between persons who are in a confidential relation to each other, not only between guardian and ward, but especially so between attorney and client, since a client B receiving a gift would be in a position of great suspicion, and therefore before he accepts it he should advise his client to go and get the independent advice of another solicitor. That is no great hardship upon him. But if he does not do that, then he has allowed himself to come under the well-established rule against the validity of such gifts, and he cannot support the transaction.

C In the present case the gift was made not to the solicitor himself, but to his wife. But in Goddard v. Carlisle (4) RICHARDS, C.B., said (9 Price, at p. 179) :

“There is no difference in principle between a gift of this sort to a man’s wife, and a gift immediately to himself, if the gift to the wife be effected by undue means on the part of the husband.”

D The principle and basis of the rule is that, while confidential relations exist between a solicitor and client, it is impossible to rebut any inference of undue influence in the making of the gift. It applies as much in the case of a gift to the solicitor’s wife as in the case of a gift to the solicitor himself. With regard to the facts of this case I do not take the same view of the evidence as the Master of the Rolls. It seems that some time before the execution of this deed the plaintiff had expressed her intention of leaving these houses to her niece. That is to say she intended E to make a will in her niece’s favour. A will is a revocable instrument, and all that a promise to make a will in somebody’s favour means is that the promisor has at that time an intention of making a will of that nature. There is no evidence here as to any instructions being given by the plaintiff for the drawing of the deed, but when she met the solicitor for the purpose of signing her will he put this deed F also before her. She asked why there were two documents to sign. She says now that she did not understand that the deed was irrevocable. [His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence, and stated that in his opinion it did not support the allegation that the plaintiff when signing the deed understood the difference between a deed and a will.] However, I do not base my judgment upon that, because even if the plaintiff knew the difference between a deed and a will, under G the long-established rule in equity which I have mentioned, this deed must be declared void. I agree that the deed must be set aside, and this appeal will therefore be allowed.

Master and Servant—Liability of master for act of servant—Act done by servant in course of employment—Assault—Conviction of servant—Release from further proceedings—Subsequent action against employer.

A master is liable for a wrongful assault committed by his servant in the course of, and in furtherance of, his employment, and an action will lie against the master even though the servant has been convicted and fined for the assault.

The defendant was a furniture dealer and much of his business consisted of selling furniture on the hire-purchase system. P., the manager of one of his shops, had authority to do this and also to re-take furniture if payments fell into arrear. P. went with another servant of the defendant to re-take a bed the hirer of which was in arrears with his payments, but the plaintiff, the hirer's landlord, refused to let them take it away on the grounds that the hirer had left it as security for unpaid rent. There was a struggle, the plaintiff was injured, and the other servant was later convicted and fined for assault. In an action for damages against the defendant for trespass and assault,

Held: P. and the other servants were acting in the course of their employment in re-taking the bed, and the defendant was liable even though the servant had already paid the fine and was released from further civil proceedings.

B Appeal from a decision of LAWRENCE, J., with a jury at the trial of an action to recover damages for trespass and assault.

The action was brought against Munday and Price to recover damages for trespass and assault. The defendant Munday carried on business as a dealer in furniture, and Price was the manager of one of his shops. It was a regular part of the business to sell furniture upon the hire-purchase system. Price had sold a bedstead upon the hire-purchase system to one Stiles. Stiles was then a lodger residing in the house of the plaintiff. Stiles ceased to lodge in the plaintiff's house, but left the bedstead there. He was in arrear with the payment of his instalments under the hire-purchase agreement, and he asked Price to take back the bedstead. Price and another man, named Simson, went together to the plaintiff's house to take possession of, and remove the bedstead. The plaintiff objected upon the ground that Stiles had left it as a security for arrears of rent. While Price and Simson were engaged in getting possession of the bedstead, Simson assaulted the plaintiff. For this assault he was convicted and fined, and paid the fine. All the above facts took place without the knowledge of Munday.

D The action was tried before LAWRENCE, J., and a jury, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff for £40 damages. The defendant Munday applied to the Court of Appeal for judgment or for a new trial.

The Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, provides :

E "Section 44. If the justices, upon the hearing of any such case of assault or battery upon the merits, where the complaint was preferred by or on the behalf of the party aggrieved, under either of the last two preceding sections, shall deem the offence not to be proved, or shall find the assault or battery to have been justified, or so trifling as not to merit any punishment, and shall accordingly dismiss the complaint, they shall forthwith make out a certificate under their hands stating the fact of such dismissal, and shall deliver such certificate to the party against whom the complaint was preferred.

F "Section 45. If any person against whom any such complaint as in either of the last three preceding sections mentioned, shall have been preferred by or on the behalf of the party aggrieved, shall have obtained such certificate, or, having been convicted, shall have paid the whole amount adjudged to be paid, or shall have suffered the imprisonment or imprisonment with hard labour awarded, in every such case he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause."

G Montague Lush for the defendant.
H M. Shearman for the plaintiffs.

I LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case the action was brought to recover damages for assault and trespass. The learned judge left the case to the jury. This application is made upon the ground that there was nothing to leave to the jury, and that the plaintiff ought to have been non-suited. The question before us is, not whether a right direction was given to the jury, but whether there was any evidence upon which the judge might properly leave the case to the jury with a proper direction—whether the judge could properly have left this case to the jury with a direction in the words of the rule laid down in Limpus v. General Omnibus Co. (1). The question is whether it was part of the business of Price and of his employment by his master, if any of the instalments were not paid, to get the goods back from the person to whom they had been hired? It was a very material part of this business to get back goods whenever instalments were not paid. The jury, therefore, might properly come to the conclusion that it was a part of the business, which was left to the management of Price, to get back the goods if instalments were not paid. He went to this house for that very purpose, and the jury might properly find that it was part of his employment. He went to the house in order to get the bedstead and take it back for his master. There was a struggle, and the plaintiff was injured. Price was doing that which he was employed to do, and he did it in a brutal manner.

Under these circumstances could the judge properly ask the jury whether he was employed to get back the bedstead, and whether he did what he did in the course of that employment? In Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co. (1) WILLES, J. (1 H. & C. at p. 540) states the proper question to be

“whether the servant was acting at the time in the course of his master’s service, and for his master’s benefit; if so, his act was that of his master, although no express command or privity of his master was proved.”

It seems to me that this case is within those very words, and that those words would be a proper direction to the jury in this case, and that there was evidence to support such a direction.

It has been contended that, if the excess of the servant is a criminal act, that would take the case out of the general rule. But in Seymour v. Greenwood (2) and in Bayley v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (3) there were assaults, which were criminal acts, and the courts did not take the ground that the general rule was not applicable if the excess of the servant was a criminal act. I do not say that, if a criminal act is done by the servant in the course of his employment, it may not be such that the jury may say that it was not done in course of, or in furtherance of his employment, but was of such a character that it was done only to satisfy his own brutal temper. The fact that what was done was a criminal offence may be material for the consideration of the jury, but the mere fact that it was a criminal offence does not take the case out of the general rule. The question is not whether the act was within the authority of the servant. The authority of the servant is to do what he is told, and to do it properly. But the law says that if a man, who is employed to do a thing properly, in the course of his employment exceeds his authority, then the master is liable. The law has always been so laid down. I think, therefore, that there was evidence to leave to the jury upon which they might find for the plaintiff, and that the judge was not bound to non-suit the plaintiff.

With reference to the argument upon the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, s. 45, all we have to do so to construe the Act itself. The statute itself does whatever is done. In my opinion the Act does not effect anything in respect of a person other than the person convicted or acquitted. This appeal, therefore, fails, and must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the statute I agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said. Looking at its provisions it is clear that it applies only to the person convicted or acquitted. The object of the Act was to remedy the evil of criminal proceedings being first taken, and of a civil action being then brought to recover damages for the same assault. The exoneration given by the statute clearly applies only to the person who has been proceeded against criminally.

As to the other point, I confess that for some time I was in doubt, but that doubt has been removed. The assault took place under these circumstances. Price was the general manager of the defendant, and he had authority to let out furniture on the hire-purchase system, and to retake the furniture if instalments became in arrear. In the present case he seems to have acted for the purpose of getting back a bed for his master. While doing so there was a struggle, and the plaintiff was assaulted. These being the facts, it is contended that there was no evidence upon which to leave to the jury the question whether Price was acting within the scope of his employment. It is perfectly clear that the question whether acts are, in fact, within the scope of the employment of a servant is one for the jury, but that the question whether the particular acts can be within the scope of the employment is for the judge.

It is said that the judge ought to have non-suited the plaintiff in the present case. I think that the jury might properly come to the conclusion that Price, being the general manager of the defendant, had authority to get possession of the bed, and that in the interests of his master, and in furtherance of his employment, he committed the assault. The law is, that all acts of a servant done in the course of his employment, and in furtherance of the employment, and in the master's interests, are within the scope of the servant's employment, and that the master is liable for such acts, although they may be contrary to his express orders, and amount to a criminal offence. Seymour v. Greenwood (2) and Bayley v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (3) are contrary to the contention of the defendant. It was, in my opinion, open to the jury to find that the act was, in fact, done within the scope of the servant's employment. If, however, the act was done from private malice, or outside the course of the employment, then the master is not liable. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion upon both points. The Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, s. 45, alters the common law by providing that when a person has been convicted for an assault and has paid or suffered the penalty no further proceeding, civil or criminal, can be brought against him for the same cause. It has been argued that, by the conviction, the servant was released, and that at common law, by the release of one tort-feasor, any right of action against another for the same tort is put an end to, and that, therefore, the statute not only releases the one who has been convicted, but has the same operation as a release by the parties. There is nothing of that kind to be found in the Act itself, and we ought not so to construe it.

Then as to the other question. In the reported cases different expressions have been used, which have led to some confusion. In some of the cases the expression "scope of his authority" is used. I think, however, that those words in those cases mean exactly the same thing as "course of his employment." An act may be done by a servant in the course of his employment, though it may be quite outside the scope of any authority which has been given to him. In the present case the servant did wrong in using violence. The law has been clearly laid down by WILLES, J., in Bayley v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Rail. Co. (3), where he says (7 C.P. at p. 420) :

"A person who put another in his place to do a class of acts in his absence, necessarily leaves him to determine, according to the circumstances that arise, when an act of that class is to be done, and trusts him for the manner in which it is done; and consequently he is held answerable for the wrong of the person so intrusted, either in the manner of doing such an act or in doing such an act under circumstances in which it ought not to have been done; provided that what was done was done, not from any caprice of the servant, but in the course of the employment."

In the present case the class of acts which this person was appointed to do included the resumption of the possession of furniture if instalments were not paid. The act complained of was done by the servant while engaged in doing such acts. If, in the course of doing those acts, the servant acted in accordance with, or against, his orders is immaterial. The master is responsible for what the servant does. There was here a case proper to be left to the jury, and this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Maintenance of Action—Criminal proceedings—Indemnity of solicitor in respect of costs of prosecution—Right of action on indemnity.

The doctrine of maintenance is confined to civil actions, and does not apply to criminal proceedings, the "maintaining" of which is, therefore, not illegal. Accordingly, where a person gives a guarantee whereby he agrees to indemnify a solicitor in respect of the costs of criminal proceedings to be undertaken against another person, and such proceedings are taken and costs incurred, the solicitor can maintain an action on that guarantee, and the person sued thereon cannot set up as a defence that the agreement was void as being tainted with the illegality of maintenance.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of His Honour Judge LUMLEY SMITH, Q.C., sitting at Westminster County Court.

The plaintiff, a solicitor, sought to recover from the defendant a sum of £20 for work done as solicitor for Madame Holderner under the following guarantee :

"24, Bride Lane, London, E.C., Aug. 11, 1892.—Dear Sir,—In consideration of your taking up the proceedings against Nassib A. Shibley on behalf of Madame Holderner, I hereby undertake and agree to indemnify you to the extent of £20 towards the costs of such proceedings, it being understood that you are not to call upon me to pay you that sum for a period of twelve months from this date.—Yours faithfully, T. Gibson Thompson.—G. R. Grant, Esq., Solicitor."

The defendant had been in the employment of Shibley, and sued him for damages for wrongful dismissal, but failed. Shibley retaliated by charging the defendant with theft, but failed. The plaintiff acted as solicitor for the defendant in both proceedings. The plaintiff then stated to the defendant that Shibley had hired furniture of one Bustani, and had dealt with the furniture in such a way as to bring himself within the criminal law, and that Bustani could prosecute him. The plaintiff accordingly assisted the defendant to open communications with Bustani. Bustani and Madame Holderner (who was stated to be the wife of Bustani, and whose property the goods turned out to be) consented to a prosecution being commenced by the plaintiff in the name of Madame Holderner. Shibley was charged, and, after being remanded in custody, was committed for trial at the Middlesex Quarter Sessions, for larceny as a bailee, under the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 3 [see now s. 1 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916: 5 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1012]. After the commencement of the proceedings, the plaintiff obtained from the defendant the guarantee now in question. Shibley was acquitted; Bustani and Madame Holderner disappeared without paying any part of the plaintiff's bill of costs, amounting to over £72, and, after some delay, the plaintiff brought the present action against the defendant.

A The learned judge drew the inferences of fact from the evidence that the defendant did not act from charitable motives towards Madame Holderner, and that there was no privity of estate, kinship, or relationship of master and servant, or otherwise between the plaintiff and Madame Holderner of the nature to justify maintenance as explained in Harris v. Brisco (1) and other cases, and that the plaintiff knew all this.

B Before the learned judge it was objected on the part of the defendant that the agreement was void as tainted with the illegality of maintenance. The plaintiff replied that the maintenance of criminal suits was legal; and, secondly, that even if such maintenance was illegal, the agreement was nevertheless binding as between himself and the defendant. The learned judge held that the maintenance of criminal suits was not illegal, and that it was not illegal on the part of the defendant to "maintain" Madame Holderner's criminal proceedings. It therefore became unnecessary for him to decide the second point, namely, whether, assuming maintenance, the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant was nevertheless binding on the defendant, though he expressed the opinion that as maintenance was a misdemeanour and the contract had been made when the plaintiff and the defendant were fully cognisant of all the facts, it was very doubtful if the contract could be enforced, assuming the law of maintenance to apply. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff for £20, the amount claimed, and he gave leave to appeal. The defendant appealed.

Boxall (Willis, Q.C., with him) for the defendant.

R. Wallace, Q.C. (G. C. Smith with him), for the plaintiff, was stopped.

E WILLIS, J.—I am very clearly of opinion that the county court judge was right, and I also think that he gave a very careful and exhaustive judgment on the subject. It seems to me that the law is, that there cannot be maintenance in the case of a criminal prosecution. The prosecutor in criminal proceedings is only nominally the prosecutor, and the theory is that the prosecution is a proceeding taken at the suit of the Crown. The reason why a person has the right to use the name of the Sovereign in criminal proceedings is, that it is for the benefit of the community that there should be no impediment in putting the criminal law in motion when circumstances demand it. In such a case as the present the circumstances did not demand it, but no one can foresee that until the case is ended. The real remedy of the plaintiff when he complains that the criminal law has been improperly put in motion against him is by an action for malicious prosecution, and if in such action it should appear that there was no reasonable and probable cause, and that there was malice, then the person who so put the law in motion, whether the nominal prosecutor or not, would be liable. That being so, there is therefore effectual protection in the case of an unfounded prosecution. In civil suits there is no such protection, because in civil suits there is no action for malicious prosecution analogous to one for malicious prosecution consequent upon a proceeding in a criminal court. That would seem to show that the only case where you can have an action for maintenance is where there cannot be an action for malicious prosecution—that is, in civil suits.

H When we once realise that every person has an interest, and is allowed to put the law in motion in criminal matters, the foundation of the doctrine of maintenance is gone. Maintenance is meddling with matters in which a person has no concern. This clearly can have no application in criminal matters, as a person puts the criminal law in motion, not for his own protection, but for the public good. That seems to me to be substantially the view the learned judge took in this case, and I should hardly have thought it necessary to say so much if it had not been for the great respect I entertain for the opinion expressed by Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., in Bradlaugh v. Newdegate (2) that the doctrine of maintenance is not confined to civil actions. That was a mere dictum, and I do not think it was at all necessary for the decision of the case, and probably there were no authorities on that point brought to his attention. In the present case the learned counsel for the defendant has found it necessary to rely on that dictum; but it is sufficient to say in general terms that he has not been able to produce even the semblance of an argument in favour of his contention. He has founded an argument on the meaning of the word "quarrel" in certain of the definitions of maintenance which speak about interfering in "quarrels and actions." But the word "quarrel" is certainly not applicable to proceedings of a criminal nature by the Crown, nor is the word "action," though in COMYN'S DIGEST, to which we have been referred, the word is apparently used as applicable in criminal matters, but it is not so used in the ordinary acceptation of the term. It has never been generally used with such a meaning, either in Acts of Parliament or elsewhere.

During the argument we have been referred to the proceedings in "attaint." That was a very peculiar proceeding, and it was commenced by a writ of attaint which could issue either out of Chancery or out of the King's Bench or Exchequer. The judgment in such a proceeding was partly punitive, and it is quite obvious that that proceeding has no analogy to the present case. I think therefore that this appeal fails.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree.

Appeal from a decision of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., at the trial of an action brought against the sheriff of Dorsetshire for trespass in breaking into the plaintiff's premises in Chancery Lane, Bridport, and seizing his goods. The plaintiff was a judgment debtor. For the purpose of executing a writ of fi. fa. the sheriff's officer went to the premises in question, and finding them locked asked the plaintiff who was standing outside to open the door. The plaintiff refused to do so. The officer then broke in the outer door of the premises, and entered and seized goods of the plaintiff. The premises consisted of a shop and workshop, and a place for storing goods. The plaintiff was a coachbuilder, and used the premises for the purposes of his business. They were merely business premises, no one lived there.

At the trial of the action before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., with a jury, the jury assessed the damages at £50; but the learned judge after the verdict ruled that the forcible entry by the sheriff's officer was lawful, and he therefore gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Channell, Q.C. (Bullen and Muir Mackenzie with him) for the defendant.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that in this case we should apply the good rule that an ancient decision, such as Penton v. Brown (1), which is more than two hundred years old, upon a matter of practice, which is one of continual occurrence in the ordinary dealings of life, should not be overruled. The case is still stronger when it has been handed down through the centuries from book to book by careful writers and commentators, in text books which are being continually acted on by people in the daily affairs of life. Even if we were of opinion that the decision was wrong we ought not to overrule a case decided two hundred years ago, the principle and reason of which has been since frequently recognised by great judges.

The first direct decision we have to deal with is Penton v. Brown (1). The judges who decided that case acted upon what in their view had been laid down in Semayne's Case (2). Semayne's Case (2) decided that the privilege of inviolability exists only in favour of a person in connection with his own dwelling-house. What is the meaning of "dwelling-house?" It is a word in ordinary use, and we all know what it means. In Semayne's Case (2) it was resolved that "the house of every one is to him as his castle and fortress," and the learned editors of SMITH'S LEADING CASES, in their note upon Semayne's Case (2), say (9th Edn.) at p. 115, that "the maxim that 'a man's house is his castle' only extends to his dwelling-house; therefore a barn, or outhouse, not connected with the dwelling-house may be broken open in order to levy an execution."

LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., in Lee v. Gansel (3), clearly adopted that view of the law (1 Cowp. at p. 6), and gives as the ground of it

"that otherwise the consequences would be fatal, for it would leave the family within naked and exposed to thieves and robbers."

The same view of the law was evidently adopted also by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in Brown v. Glenn (4), and by that most exact lawyer, LORD BLACKBURN, in Hobson v. Thellusson (5). The matter is one with which sheriffs all over the country have to deal daily, and there is one consensus of opinion among those great judges that I have mentioned, and all text-book writers upon the subject, that the doctrine of the inviolability of a man's house extends only to his dwelling-house, and therefore a sheriff in executing a writ is entitled to break into premises which do not come within the meaning of the term "dwelling-house." The view of all lawyers has been uniform from the beginning, and we cannot give way to the argument which is now brought before us for the first time. The premises in this case were not a dwelling-house, whatever else they may have been, and the sheriff was therefore justified in breaking open the outer door. The appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The doctrine which forbids a sheriff from breaking into a dwelling-house in order to execute a writ of fi. fa. is very ancient, and proceeds upon the ground that a man and his family ought to be protected in the occupation of their dwelling-house. "Every man's house is his castle" is the maxim, but the privilege extends to dwelling-houses only, and therefore a barn or other building not connected with a dwelling-house, nor within the curtilage, may be broken open by a sheriff for the purpose of executing a writ of fi. fa. The leading authority on the subject is Penton v. Brown (1), decided in the reign of Charles II. The case has been referred to as good authority by every text-book writer since that date on the law applicable to sheriffs, and by LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., and LORD BLACKBURN. We cannot overrule a case which has such a long line of authorities in its favour. Therefore, a man is protected from the breaking open by the sheriff of the outer door of his dwelling-house, but he is not so protected in the case of barns or other buildings not within the curtilage, unconnected with his dwelling-house. In this case the forcible entry of the sheriff was justified, and the judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., was right. The appeal will be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We have not now to deal with a case of a landlord distraining for rent, but of a sheriff executing a writ of fi. fa. As was observed by LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in Brown v. Glenn (4) (16 Q.B. at p. 257) :

"A distinction may reasonably be made between the powers of an officer acting in execution of legal process and the powers of a private individual who takes the law into his own hands and for his own purposes. There is another well-known distinction, that a landlord cannot distrain at all hours, whereas the sheriff is under no such restriction."

The question before us is whether the sheriff is entitled to break open the outer door of a workshop which is entirely unconnected with a dwelling-house. In Penton v. Brown (1) it was held that the door of a barn, which was not a dwelling-house nor within the curtilage, might be broken open by a sheriff acting under the mandate of the law, he being in a different position from a landlord distraining for his rent. That distinction is referred to by the editors of SMITH'S LEADING CASES in their notes to Semayne's Case (2). They say (9th Edn.) at p. 115, that the maxim that

" 'a man's house is his castle' only extends to his dwelling-house : therefore a barn, or outhouse, not connected with the dwelling-house may be broken open in order to levy an execution : Penton v. Brown (1); but not to make a distress for rent : Brown v. Glenn (4)."

It is admitted that, in every text book upon the subject, that doctrine is laid down as having been decided in Penton v. Brown (1). Then in Brown v. Glenn (4), LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., says (16 Q.B. at p. 257) :

"In Penton v. Brown (1) it was decided on demurrer that the outer door of an outhouse might be broken open for the purpose of executing a fi. fa."

The question came again before the court in Hobson v. Thellusson (5), and there, as reported in the LAW JOURNAL, LORD BLACKBURN said (36 L.J.Q.B. at p. 305) :

"I do not think that the sheriff's officer was bound to go off at once and take a crowbar to break open the doors, although, no doubt, that might have been done, as the goods were in a warehouse, and not in a dwelling-house . . . He certainly might have broken the doors open and have seized the goods."

The question before the court was, whether the sheriff was negligent in not seizing the goods before ten o'clock, at which hour a certain deed was executed, and the court held that he was not negligent because he was not bound to break in at once.

It has been argued that the passage from LORD BLACKBURN's judgment which I have read is not to be relied upon, because the report of the case in the LAW REPORTS is not quite the same. LORD BLACKBURN is there reported to have said this (L.R. 2 Q.B. at p. 648) :

"I think the officer was not bound to go to the office earlier than he did; and that he proceeded with due diligence; and that he was not bound to break open the door of the warehouse at once without further inquiry, in the absence of any direction from the execution creditor to proceed with the utmost dispatch."

It seems to me that those words come to the same thing. The effect of the judgments of LORD BLACKBURN and MELLOR, J., is that the sheriff was not bound to break in at once, and the judgments would in my opinion be irrational if the sheriff had no power at all to break in.

It has also been argued that Penton v. Brown (1) has been disapproved of by BOWEN, L.J., in American Concentrated Must Corp'n. v. Hendry (6). But all that he says (62 L.J.Q.B. at p. 390) is,

"In Penton v. Brown (1) it was indeed held that a sheriff, for purposes of execution, might break a barn which was in a field, as distinct from a barn which was parcel of a house, but the court agreed that if the barn had been adjoining to a parcel of the house, it could not lawfully have been broken. The law so laid down in Penton v. Brown (1) as to the sheriff's rights with regard to a detached outhouse in a field, appears to me to be a departure from older law."

He does not say that the decision in Penton v. Brown (1) is not law, nor that it ought now to be overruled. I think that the decision in Penton v. Brown (1) ought not now to be overruled, nor any alteration made in the long course of practice that has existed for the last 200 years and more. The judgment of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BOARD OF TRADE v. PROVIDENT CLERKS AND GENERAL GUARANTEE ASSOCIATION, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.), April 10, 1895]

[Reported 72 L.T. 562; 39 Sol. Jo. 428]

Bankruptcy—Trustee in bankruptcy—Powers—Trustee appointed by Board of Trade—Power to give indemnity to agent—Distraint by agent for rent due to bankrupt's estate—Indemnity by trustee against consequences of illegal distress—Proceeds of distress retained by agent and not paid into Bankruptcy Estates Account—Liability of trustee and guarantors under bond for consequent loss to estate.

A trustee in bankruptcy appointed by the Board of Trade has no authority, without the sanction of the Board, to give a personal indemnity to his agent against the consequences of selling goods seized for rent due to the bankrupt's estate. When such goods are sold it is the statutory duty of the trustee to require that the proceeds of the sale should at once be paid into the Bankruptcy Estates Account. Accordingly, where loss was occasioned to the bankrupt's estate by the trustee's failure to obtain payment into the Bankruptcy Estates Account of the proceeds of a distress for rent levied by his agent,

Held: notwithstanding an indemnity given to the agent by the trustee, he and his guarantors were liable to the Board of Trade on a bond given by them guaranteeing to make good any loss or damage to the bankrupt's estate occasioned by the default of the trustee in the performance of his statutory duties.

Notes. For the law relating to bankruptcy see now the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 321).

As to powers and duties of trustee in bankruptcy, see 2 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 382 et seq.; and for cases see 4 DIGEST (Repl.) 236 et seq.

Special Case stated by consent of the parties for the opinion of the court under R.S.C., Ord. 34.

April 10, 1895. KENNEDY, J., read the following judgment of the court.—The claim of the plaintiffs in this Special Case is for a sum of £120 19s., due from the defendants upon a bond of Mar. 17, 1891, given to the plaintiffs by the defendants and George Hendry, the trustee in the bankruptcy of one Weissenfeld, appointed by the Board of Trade under s. 21 (6) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now s. 19 (6) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914]. By the bond the defendants became jointly and severally bound to the Board of Trade in the sum of £300,

“if the said trustee shall fail [in the duties required of him as trustee] and the said association shall make good any loss or damage occasioned by any such default made after the date hereof to the estate of the said bankrupt.”

The plaintiffs sue the defendants upon this bond, and the question is whether the trustee has failed in the performance of his duties and loss or damage has been occasioned by his default to the estate of the bankrupt.

It is unnecessary for the purposes of this judgment to recapitulate in any detail the circumstances which are fully set forth in the Special Case. Shortly stated, the material points are these. Rent to the amount of about £562 was owing to the trustee as representing the bankrupt's estate. The trustee distrained by his agent, Sinclair, for this rent. Sinclair, in levying the distress, acted illegally by a forcible

A breaking. The tenant commenced an action against the trustee and Sinclair for this illegality, claiming (inter alia) a return of the goods seized under the distress. The trustee, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, defended the action. He directed Sinclair to sell the goods seized, and Sinclair did so, but only upon the trustee giving him in writing his personal indemnity against the consequences. The goods were sold and realised £281 17s. The trustee was not authorised by the Board of Trade to give any indemnity. It was an act which, in our judgment, he could not properly do without that authority.

We are further of opinion that under ss. 74 and 75 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see now ss. 89, 88 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914] and r. 295, it was the duty of the trustee, immediately the distress was realised, to require and procure the proceeds to be paid into the Bankruptcy Estates Account, and that in not doing so, but allowing his co-defendant to keep these proceeds under his control, the trustee failed to perform his statutory duty. The tenant, who, as we have said, was suing the trustee and Sinclair for their tortious conduct, applied, after the sale to STIRLING, J., for an order that the £281 17s. should be paid into court. The trustee appeared upon the summons and did not oppose, but explained that he was bound to pay the proceeds of the sale into the Bankruptcy Estates Account, and he gave an undertaking that the money when paid in should not be dealt with without notice to the plaintiff in the action. No order was made upon the summons. The trustee asked Sinclair for the £281 17s., but Sinclair refused to part with the money, and the trustee wrongly, in our opinion, took no steps to enforce payment of it. The action for wrongful distress was tried; judgment was given for the plaintiff for damages, and these were assessed by the official referee at £500. The successful plaintiff, towards satisfaction of his judgment, sought, by the appointment of a receiver, to get possession of the £281 17s., which was still under the control of Sinclair and his solicitor, but failed to do so, upon the ground in the Divisional Court, to which the matter had gone on appeal from the vacation judge who had made an order for a receiver, that the plaintiff in the action, having obtained judgment for damages, could not recover the money produced by the proceeds of the sale. The money was, in fact, used by Sinclair towards payment of the costs incurred to his solicitor in the action. In auditing the trustee's accounts the Board of Trade have surcharged him with this sum of £281 17s., and the accounts, being so surcharged, showed a balance of £120 19s. due from the trustee. This is the sum which the Board of Trade in the present action seeks to recover from the defendants. The trustee is now himself a bankrupt.

We are of opinion that the trustee did fail and make default in his statutory duties, and occasioned loss and damage thereby, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to the sum which they claim from the defendants under the bond. It is clear to us, and, apart from the consequences of the indemnity, it is not seriously disputed, that the trustee ought to have insisted upon payment in the Bankruptcy Estates Account of these moneys, which really represented pro tanto the rent due to the estate. The giving of the indemnity, as has been already stated, was not an act which the trustee could rightly do without the authority of the Board of Trade, which, as no committee of inspection was appointed, exercised the functions of a committee of inspection.

It is contended on behalf of the defendants that Sinclair, having got the indemnity, was entitled for his own security to retain the proceeds of the sale, which he consented to carry out only on the condition of receiving the indemnity, and that if the giving of the indemnity by the trustee was an unauthorised, and therefore an improper, act, yet that the Board of Trade, representing the creditors of the estate, cannot at the same time claim the proceeds of the sale and disaffirm the act of the trustee in giving the indemnity without which the sale would not have taken place. It appears to us that this argument is not well founded. Even assuming, with counsel for the defendants, that, as between the trustee and Sinclair, Sinclair, having got the trustee's personal indemnity, was entitled as against him to hold the proceeds as security, which appears to us to be at least open to question, we do not see how the wrongful, because unauthorised, conduct of the trustee in making a bargain with his agent, can avail the trustee or the defendants in this action, as his guarantors, in answer to the claim of the Board of Trade, representing the creditors, that he was guilty of default in not getting payment of the proceeds of the distress into the Bankruptcy Estates Account. He cannot, and consequently his guarantors therefore cannot, be heard to plead, as an excuse for the loss of these moneys, that by an arrangement which he could not properly, as against the estate, enter into with his agent, he put it out of his power to pay into the funds of the estate moneys of the estate which came into the agent's hands. Indeed, this was the view of the trustee himself, as is clear from what passed on the hearing of the summons before STIRLING, J., and from his subsequent request to Sinclair to pay over these moneys.

It was further contended for the defendants that, if there was a default on the part of the trustee, it was not a "wilful" default. In our opinion the terms of the bond do not make the defendants liable only in the event of a "wilful" default; but, if they ought to be so construed, it appears to us that what the trustee did in this case may properly be so designated, and that the particulars set out in the special case are sufficient. The trustee knew that he had no authority to give the indemnity; he knew, and he stated to STIRLING, J., that the proceeds of the distress, when realised, ought to be paid by him into the Bankruptcy Estates Account; he requested Sinclair to hand them over to him for the purpose of their being paid into that account, and then he took no steps to enforce the payment which he knew and had thus openly acknowledged ought to be made, but left this asset of the estate in the hands of his agent and his agent's solicitor. It seems clear to us that the trustee failed, with his eyes open, and not either inadvertently or by any oversight, to perform his statutory duty; that money was lost to the estate thereby; that a just claim on the bond for £120 19s. is thereby created, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover that amount from the defendants.

CHATTERTON v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL

[Reported [1895] 2 Q.B. 189; 64 L.J.Q.B. 676; 72 L.T. 858; 59 J.P. 596;

Libel—Privilege—Absolute privilege—Secretary of State—Official communication to under-secretary.

A written communication from a Secretary of State to his under-secretary, made by him in the course of carrying out his official duties as Secretary of State, is absolutely privileged. An action for libel founded upon such a communication cannot be maintained, and may be dismissed as vexatious.

Appeal from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (MATHEW and DAY, JJ.) dismissing as vexatious an action brought to recover damages for libel.

The plaintiff alleged by his statement of claim that he was a captain in Her Majesty's Indian Staff Corps on half pay, and that in March, 1893, the defendant, the Secretary of State for India, conveyed in writing to Mr. G. Russell, M.P., untrue statements concerning the plaintiff's professional reputation. Mr. Russell was at that date the Parliamentary under-secretary to the defendant, and the alleged libel was contained in a letter sent to him by the defendant instructing him as to the answer to be given by him to a question asked in the House of Commons with regard to the plaintiff's treatment by the Indian military authorities and government.

The master struck out the action as vexatious and his decision was affirmed by the judge at chambers, and by the Queen's Bench Division. The plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff in person.

J. R. Paget for the defendant.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—This is an action of libel brought against the Secretary of State for India in Council. It is said that the action is not brought against the Secretary personally, but against him as a corporation. It does not signify whether that be so or not: the substance of the thing is this, that it is an action of libel brought against a high official of State in respect of a statement contained in a document sent by him to his under-secretary. The plaintiff's case shows that this document was written and sent by the defendant to his under-secretary in the course of carrying out his official duties as a Secretary of State. The Queen's Bench Division has held that the action cannot be maintained, on the ground that such an act as that which is the subject of the action cannot be inquired into by a civil court of law. It is beyond the powers of a civil court to hold any inquiry upon the matter. In all the reported cases upon the subject it has been laid down that a judge should stop the case, if such an action came before him for trial, because he would have no jurisdiction even to entertain the question. As the action cannot be maintained at all, I think it would be vexatious to allow it to go on.

What is the reason for the existence of this law? It does not exist for the benefit of the official. All judges have said that the ground of its existence is the injury to the public good which would result if such an inquiry were allowed as would be necessary if the action were maintainable. An inquiry would take away from the public official his freedom of action in a matter concerning the public welfare, because he would have to appear before a jury and be cross-examined as to his conduct. That would be contrary to the interest of the public, and the privilege is, therefore, absolute in regard to the contents of such a document as that upon which this action is founded. I shall not go through the reported cases since they are all to the same effect. The result of them is summed up thus by MR. FRASER in his book on LIBEL AND SLANDER (1st Edn.), p. 95:

"For reasons of public policy the same protection would no doubt be given to anything in the nature of an act of State—for example, to every communication relating to State matters made by one Minister to another, or to the Crown."

I adopt that paragraph, which seems to me to be an exact statement of the law. This case comes within those words, and the plaintiff's action is not maintainable. I, therefore, think that the action must be dismissed as vexatious, and the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division affirmed.

KAY, L.J.—This is an action of libel brought in respect of a statement in a communication from the Secretary of State for India in Council to his Parliamentary under-secretary. Assuming for the purposes of argument that that statement is untrue and malicious, the question arises whether it is not absolutely privileged so that no action can be maintained upon it. The communication was made by the defendant to his Parliamentary under-secretary in order that it might be read as an answer to a question which the plaintiff had caused to be put to him in the House of Commons. That seems to me to be clearly an act of State. If an action of libel can be founded on such a matter as that, it seems to me that the government of the country could not be carried on.

Could an action of libel, founded on such a statement as we have here, be brought against the Secretary of State personally? The nearest authority to the present case that I know of is Anderson v. Hamilton (1). LORD ELLENBOROUGH there said (2 Brod. & Bing. at p. 157, n.):

"I do not like breaking in upon this correspondence; it might be pregnant with a thousand facts of the utmost consequence respecting the state of Government, the connection of parties, the state of politics, and the suspicion of foreign powers with whom we may be in alliance. Then it is said the fact that there has been a complaint made against the defendant by the plaintiff to Lord Liverpool is the only fact sought to be put in evidence on this occasion; but it is not competent to the plaintiff to get at that fact, if it be embodied in an official letter. Neither can an extract of such a letter be admitted, for the

A plaintiff must be entitled to the whole or none; and I think that the whole of this letter is not admissible, on account of the objections taken by the counsel for the defendant."

That decision seems to me to be to the effect that production of the letter containing the libel could not be enforced, nor could secondary evidence be given of its contents. The court would not allow the letter to be put in evidence, nor

B secondary evidence be given of what it contained.

That was also the view taken by the court in Home v. Bentinck (2). That was an action of libel, brought against the president of a military court, appointed by the Commander-in-Chief to hold an inquiry into the conduct of an officer, in respect of a statement in the report thereupon made. The court held that neither could the report be received in evidence, nor could secondary evidence of its contents be accepted, and it was absolutely privileged. DALLAS, C.J., says (2 Brod. & Bing. at p. 162) that the question was whether, if Sir Henry Torrens, who was then secretary to the Duke of York, the Commander-in-Chief, had been willing to produce the report,

D "it would not have been the bounden duty of the learned judge before whom the cause was tried, considering that this document was a secret, not the privilege of the party holding it, but of which he was a trustee on behalf of the public, to have interposed and prevented the admission of such evidence."

He then refers to certain cases in which, for reasons of State and policy, information is not permitted to be disclosed, and he says :

E "What is the ground upon which these cases stand, except it be the ground of danger to the public good which would result from disclosing the sources of such information?"

That seems to me to be a direct authority for the proposition that for reasons of State policy a document of this kind is not one upon which an action is capable of being founded. The court will not allow the document to be put in evidence, nor secondary evidence of it given, because to allow such a thing would be contrary to the public good. It is not denied that an action of slander cannot be founded upon a statement made in Parliament, and there can be no reason why a document from which that statement was made should be allowed to be used as the foundation of an action. There may be other reasons why this action might be called vexatious, because it must fail if it should come on for trial. But the ground upon which I base my judgment is that the document complained of is an act of State, and is, therefore, absolutely privileged. I think that the passage read by the Master of the Rolls from MR. FRASER'S book on LIBEL AND SLANDER accurately states the result of the cases on this point. I, therefore, agree that this appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

H A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This action has been dismissed as vexatious by the master, by the judge at chambers, and by the Divisional Court, and in my opinion it has been rightly dismissed. Two grounds have been suggested why this action ought to be dismissed. One, that it is a document passing between the Secretary of State and his under-secretary for the purpose of meeting a question that had been put in the House of Commons; and, secondly, that it is a communication by the Secretary to his under-secretary made in the course of carrying out the duties of his office. The question is, whether that document is, or is not, absolutely privileged. I can find no case exactly covering the point; but it seems to me, looking at the ratio decidendi of Home v. Bentinck (2), Anderson v. Hamilton (1), and Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (3), that, under the circumstances of this case, an absolute privilege attaches to the document complained of. But I am of opinion that it is sufficient ground for holding this document to be absolutely privileged to say that the communication from the Secretary of State for India to his undersecretary was a document of State which came into existence through the carrying out by the defendant of his official duties. Consequently the document cannot be produced in evidence in a court of justice. The reason why it cannot be produced is that it would be contrary to the public welfare, and, though no objection to producing it were taken by the defendant, it would be the duty of the judge at the trial to intervene and forbid its being made use of. Moreover, it would also be his duty to forbid secondary evidence being given of its contents. The result is that, supposing this action were allowed to go on, it would be quite useless, because the alleged libel could not be produced, nor any evidence given of it. The judges of the Divisional Court, in the exercise of the inherent jurisdiction of the court, dismissed the action as vexatious on the ground that by no possible means could the plaintiff succeed in it. I entirely agree with that, and the appeal must be dismissed.

BARFF AND OTHERS v. PROBYN

Landlord and Tenant—Fixtures—Tenant's fixtures—Right of tenant to remove—Removal of fixtures after expiry of tenancy, but while tenant still in possession and ejectment pending—Measure of damages to which landlord entitled—Value of fixtures as chattels.

The defendant's tenancy of a public-house (which was to be demolished at the end of the tenancy) expired on Sept. 29, 1893, but the defendant refused to give up possession, and on Oct. 27, 1893, the landlords began ejectment proceedings. Before the termination of those proceedings and while the defendant was still in possession of the premises he removed certain tenant's fixtures.

Held: (i) at the time the defendant removed the fixtures no tenancy, even at sufferance, existed between him and the landlords and he was a trespasser, and, therefore, notwithstanding that he was still in possession, he had lost his right to remove fixtures: Weeton v. Woodcock (1) (1840), 7 M. & W. 14, applied; (ii) the measure of damages to which the landlords were entitled was the value of the fixtures as chattels.

C Action by the plaintiffs, the freeholders and landlords of a public-house, the Five Bells, in Moorfields, Cripplegate, against the defendant, the assignee of a lease for the premises, for damages for wrongful removal and conversion by the defendant of certain fixtures.

The defendant was the assignee of a lease for twenty-one years from Sept. 29, 1872, granted by the plaintiffs' predecessors in title to one M., which expired on Sept. 29, 1893. In May, 1893, the plaintiffs agreed with one Cosh to grant him a building

D lease of the premises together with some adjoining property from Sept. 29 following, when the defendant's tenancy expired. Cosh was to take down the buildings on possession being given to him on the expiration of the defendant's term, and adapt them to other purposes. Negotiations took place between the defendant and Cosh (the incoming tenant) as to the purchase by Cosh of the fixtures of the public-house. On Sept. 27 the fixtures were valued at £148 9s. if the premises were

E to be carried on as part of a going concern, and at £26 17s. for breaking-up price. Cosh, however, in October, agreed to pay the defendant £90 for these fixtures, but failed to do so. The defendant's tenancy having expired on Sept. 29, the plaintiffs required him to give up possession but he declined to do so and remained on in possession, as Cosh had not paid him the £90 for the fixtures. On Oct. 27 a writ in an action of ejectment was served by the plaintiffs on the defendant, and the

F defendant then took up the position that he was entitled to remain in possession until Cosh paid him for the fixtures. That action terminated in possession being given up, before judgment, on Mar. 16, 1894, but the defendant had in the meantime removed the fixtures. The tenant had, therefore, removed the fixtures—which were taken to be "tenant's fixtures"—after the expiration of his tenancy on Sept. 29, 1893, but before he had given up possession on Mar. 16, 1894, and the

G question now was whether he was entitled so to remove the fixtures.

Robson, Q.C., and Corrie Grant for the plaintiffs.

Shakespeare (Jelf, Q.C., with him) for the defendant.

H CHARLES, J.—The defendant's term had expired on Sept. 29, and the fact that the plaintiffs brought an ejectment against him showed their intention of no longer treating him as tenant. Yet the defendant had removed the fixtures after his tenancy had come to an end. Penton v. Robart (2) was relied on as an authority which enabled the tenant to do so, and if that case is looked at by itself it is difficult to distinguish it from the present. There the plaintiff had recovered judgment in ejectment against the tenant for the premises in question, yet, as the

I tenant was still in fact in possession, the court held that he had not abandoned his right to the fixtures. I was at first disposed to think that I ought to act upon that decision and leave the matter to the Court of Appeal; but, on reading the notes to Elwes v. Mawe (3) in 2 Smith, L. C. (9th Edn.) 182, I find that the decision in Penton v. Robart (2) has been modified by the decision of the court as delivered by ALDERSON, B., in Weeton v. Woodcock (1), where it was held that the tenant's right to remove the fixtures continues only during the original term, and during such further term as he has a right to consider himself tenant, and then ceases, although the possession of the tenant continues; and a similar view of Penton v.

Robart (2) was taken by WILLES, J., in delivering the considered judgment of the court in Leader v. Homewood (4), though during the course of the argument in that case VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., seems to have thought that the court in Weeton v. Woodcock (1) did not qualify Penton v. Robart (2), and on reading the judgment of WILLES, J., it seems clear to me that that learned judge thought it necessary that some tenancy, although a tenancy at sufferance, should subsist.

In the present case the inference of fact which I draw is, that at the time the defendant removed these fixtures the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist, and that he was in fact a trespasser, and was so treated by the landlords when they served upon him a writ of ejectment on Oct. 27. After that date certainly the defendant could not consider himself as tenant, and therefore, his case would come within the limitation laid down by ALDERSON, B., in Weeton v. Woodcock (1)

“during such further period of possession by the tenant as he holds the premises under a right still to consider himself as tenant.”

Penton v. Robart (2) has been commented upon with but qualified approval in the cases I have referred to, and has been altogether dissented from in the Irish case of Deeble v. M'Mullen (5). Under these circumstances I reluctantly feel it my duty to follow the general course of authority in favour of the plaintiffs, in preference to the view expressed in Penton v. Robart (2), and to hold that at the time the defendant removed the fixtures he was a trespasser, and that no tenancy, even at sufferance, existed between the defendant and the plaintiffs. I take this view reluctantly, as there is some hardship in the tenant losing the value of his fixtures; but I think on the whole that the plaintiffs' case has been established, and that they are entitled to judgment.

As to the measure of damages, the passage in MAYNE ON DAMAGES (5th Edn.), p. 387, was cited that,

“in trover for fixtures which have been wrongfully removed, the plaintiff can only recover their value as chattels, though it may be less than their value as fixtures.”

The authority cited for that proposition is Clarke v. Holford (6). That was a case where the tenant was complaining of the wrongful removal of fixtures by the landlord; but it is obvious that the measure of damages which the plaintiff is entitled to in the present case, where the action is against the tenant, must be the same. As the premises were coming down and could not be used as a public-house, an incoming tenant would not have given more than the breaking-up or sale price. I think, therefore, the judgment should be for the plaintiffs for breaking-up price, that is, for £26 17s., and I give judgment for that sum, with costs on the High Court scale.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.), reported [1895] 1 Q.B. 850, reversing an order of HENN COLLINS, J., made in chambers by which he had dismissed an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of the master granting the defendants a stay of proceedings.

The action was brought for the price of work done under a building contract which contained an arbitration clause in case of any dispute arising. The defendants took out a summons at chambers for an extension of time for delivering their defence, and obtained an order. They afterwards applied for and obtained an order for a stay of proceedings, which was granted by the master. The plaintiff appealed to HENN COLLINS, J., who dismissed the appeal, and then to the Court of Appeal, which allowed the appeal. The defendants appealed to the House of Lords.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot help thinking that this is a very plain case, and we have had at least as much time occupied in its consideration as the matter deserves.

Section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, provides that a person who has by any contract agreed to go to arbitration may be compelled to observe that contractual obligation if some proceeding before the court is taken in order to stay the proceedings. In this provision there come the words which your Lordships have to construe, “before delivering any pleadings or taking any other step in the proceedings.” The sole question upon which we have been engaged is whether a summons taken out in this form, is a “step in the proceedings.” It seems to me that it is a “step in the proceedings.” I am not going to give any definition of what “a step in the proceedings” may be; it is enough for this case to say that this is “a step in the proceedings.”

There can be no doubt that what was in the mind of the legislature was this: One of the great scandals which induced the legislature to interfere by statutory provision was the delay of arbitrations; and another was the costs applicable to arbitrations, which had to be incurred notwithstanding that the proceedings did not go on, so that there were a great number of proceedings for which the parties had to pay, although they furnished no ultimate decision of their rights. The intention of the legislature in giving effect to the contract of the parties, and saying that one of them should be entitled to make an application to insist that the litigation should be conducted according to the original agreement was, that they should at once, and before any further proceedings were taken, specify the terminus a quo, and that if an application to stay proceedings was made under those circumstances, then that the court should enforce the contractual obligation to go to arbitration. That seems to me to be a very wise provision, that costs shall not be thrown away in beginning to litigate—that costs shall not be so absolutely useless as that the proceedings from which they arose shall not furnish any part of the materials upon which the judgment was ultimately to be arrived at. That was the evil against which this provision was levelled. When one remembers that this is a question now coming before your Lordships on appeal on a mere point of procedure upon which no less than six judges, I think, have expressed an opinion adverse to the contention of the appellants, and no one judge, as I understand, who has had the matter argued before him has expressed a different opinion, it is a strong thing, upon such a mere question of procedure, to come up to the highest Court of Appeal and discuss it over again.

I am not unmindful of what has been suggested, namely, that HENN COLLINS, J., made an order apparently founded on a different view of the statute; but one knows perfectly well what happens at chambers. There is no one able to tell us exactly what HENN COLLINS, J., did say, but we know that proceedings at chambers are conducted in a very hasty way sometimes; the judge merely says “Order,” or “No order,” and there is an end of the matter. All the judges before whom the question has been argued have expressed the opinion which I confess

A that I entertain strongly myself, that this is a "step in the proceedings," and the party has lost his right to have the matter determined by the agreed arbitrator by taking a step which in its terms amounted to asking for further time in order to deliver his defence.

B I have designedly avoided saying anything about the other point which one of the appellants' counsel attempted to argue, namely, that, apart from the Act of 1889, the court has inherent jurisdiction to stay proceedings in an action. Nothing appears to me more mischievous as a precedent than, when a case of this sort, involving simply a question of procedure, is taken on appeal from court to court on one ground, that the parties, when they come before the last Court of Appeal, should attempt to raise a question resting on wholly different grounds—a question not depending upon the statute at all, and one which has not been considered by any
C one of the judges before whom the case has come.

Under these circumstances I apprehend that your Lordships will not think it right to consider such a point at all. Confining myself to the one point which has been litigated here, I entertain no doubt whatever that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

D LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. The only question raised by this appeal is an exceedingly small one, and in my opinion it has been rightly decided by the learned judges in the Court of Appeal. I can see no reason to doubt that an order obtained upon a summons for extension of time for lodging a defence is a "step in the proceedings" by the defendant within the meaning of s. 4 of the E Arbitration Act, 1889.

LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD MORRIS concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the application by the appellants for an extension of time to deliver their defence, upon which an order giving fourteen days' time was obtained, was a "step in the proceedings." The proceeding in F question was unlike that in the cases which have been mentioned, where agents, without coming into court at all, have given an extra-judicial and voluntary consent, because the proceeding took place judicially in chambers, which was the same as if it had been in court. It is true that the application came before a master, and not before the judge; but he was sitting as representing the judge, and the proceeding was therefore unquestionably judicial, and a proceeding in the G cause.

I think further that the proceeding of presenting such a summons and supporting it before the master implied a statement to the effect that the appellants intended to defend the action. It was on that representation only that the order of court was obtained. Having regard to the provisions of the Arbitration Act, this
H appears to me to have been in effect an abandonment of the proposal to have the subject of the cause disposed of by arbitration. On these grounds I am of opinion with your Lordships that the appellants' summons, with what followed on it, was a proceeding in the cause, or a step in the judicial proceedings, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

I LORD DAVEY concurred.

Re AMBITION INVESTMENT BUILDING SOCIETY

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaughan Williams, J.), November 6, 7, 1895]

Building Society—Shares—Withdrawal—Notice prescribed by rules—Cessation of operation of rules—Insolvency of society—Stoppage of business.

Where the rules of a building society provide that members shall be entitled to withdraw their shares on giving notice the rules cease to operate, not on the insolvency of the society, but on stoppage of its business or on it becoming recognised that stoppage must take place.

The rules of a building society provided for withdrawal of shares on giving one month's notice. On Jan. 28, 1891, a report and balance sheet issued by the directors showed a surplus of only some £203, and stated that no new business had been done in 1890 and that the directors were of opinion that the society should be dissolved and a meeting called to discuss this question. On Feb. 5, 1891, a circular was issued by the society convening a special meeting on Feb. 12 to consider resolutions to dissolve the society, and at that meeting resolutions dissolving the society were passed. Mrs. L., a non-borrowing member, had given a notice of withdrawal which matured on Feb. 7 or 10, viz., between the date of the circular and the special meeting, and between Feb. 5 and Feb. 12 other members had given notices of withdrawal which did not mature until after the date of the special meeting.

Held: neither the report nor the circular recognised the necessity of stopping business, but merely contemplated that the members would decide that question one way or the other, and the necessity for stopping business was not recognised until the resolutions of Feb. 12; accordingly, Mrs. L.'s notice had matured before a stoppage of business or the recognition of the necessity for stoppage and she was entitled to be paid in full before the other non-borrowing members who must be paid pari passu without any priorities.

Summons taken out by the liquidators of the Ambition Investment Building Society to determine the priorities of the members in respect of surplus assets.

B The building society was established in 1886, and was registered under the Building Societies Act, 1874.

C The rules of the society provided (r. 3) that an annual general meeting should be held in February, at which a balance-sheet, with a report from the directors, should be laid before the members; (r. 16) that holders of shares, on which not less than six months subscription had been paid, and in respect of which no advance had been made should be "investing members," and the holders of shares on which an advance had been made should be "borrowing members." Rule 21 was as follows :

D "Withdrawal.—Any member may withdraw all or any of his shares upon giving one month's notice in writing to the secretary, when such member shall be entitled to receive back his net monthly subscriptions, with such portion of the profits realised as may have been posted to his credit, together with such interest as the directors, in their opinion, consider the state of the society's business will allow, such interest to be calculated up to the end of the month preceding the date of such notice. If more than one member shall give notice to withdraw, they shall be paid in rotation according to priority of notice; provided always that widows and children of deceased members shall have precedence."

E Rule 30 provided for the dissolution of the society on the resolution of three-quarters of the members present at a special general meeting convened for that purpose.

F On Jan. 28, 1891, the directors issued a balance-sheet which showed a surplus of £203 16s. 3d., and a report which stated that during 1890 the society had done no new business; that in their opinion it ought to be dissolved; and that a meeting would be called to discuss the question. The principal asset shown by the balance-sheet was a sum of £9,000 odd outstanding on loans to borrowing members on the security of leasehold property in respect of which a loss considerably exceeding the sum of £203 16s. 3d. had been sustained. On Feb. 5, 1891, a circular was issued by the secretary, under the direction of the directors, convening a special meeting for Feb. 12, following immediately after the conclusion of the annual general meeting, at which resolutions would be proposed to dissolve the society and to appoint liquidators. On Feb. 12, 1891, the special meeting was held, and resolutions dissolving the society and appointing liquidators were passed. The liquidators carried on the business of the society, realised the assets, and paid the outside creditors. In May, 1895, an order was made to continue the voluntary winding-up under the supervision of the court. Meanwhile, on Jan. 10, 1891, Mrs. Lark, a non-borrowing member of the society, had given notice of withdrawal which matured between the issue of the circular and the passing of the resolutions to wind-up. On Feb. 5, 1891, Miss Abrey had given notice of withdrawal. On Feb. 6 and 12, 1891, nine other members had given a similar notice. It appeared from the evidence that at the date of the circular the sum of £9,000 odd due from the borrowing members was worth about £1,000 less than the nominal amount.

I J. Henderson for Mrs. Lark.

Chester Jones for Miss Abrey.

Hansell for members who had given notice after the issue of the circular.

Fawcus for the liquidators and for members who had given no notice of withdrawal.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is a case which raises questions as to the priorities of the non-borrowing members of the Ambition Investment Building Society. The society has dissolved and has paid all its outside creditors in full, and there is a surplus left, and the question is as to the priorities of these non-borrowing members inter se. It may be taken that the material dates are these: On Jan. 28, 1891, a report and balance-sheet were issued by the directors of the society, and on Feb. 5 a circular was issued by the secretary by the direction of the officers of the society, convening a special meeting to take place on Feb. 12, immediately after the conclusion of the annual general meeting, to consider resolutions to the effect that the society should be dissolved; and on Feb. 12 the special meeting was held, and the society was dissolved. There are various classes of non-borrowing members who are represented before me. A certain number of non-borrowing members had given notice of withdrawal, and they say that the giving of their notices under the circumstances of this case gave them a right of priority in the distribution of the assets of the society among the members inter se remaining after payment in full of the outside creditors of the society. One of these claimants is a lady named Mrs. Lark. It appears that she gave a notice of withdrawal which matured on Feb. 7 or 10 (it does not matter in the least which), that is, on some day between the issue of the circular convening the meeting and the holding of the meeting itself. In the case of all the other members claiming priority their notices did not mature until after the resolutions for dissolution had been passed on Feb. 12. For the judgment which I am about to deliver it is immaterial to consider the particular dates of their notices as in the case of Mrs. Lark.

Sometimes it is not an assistance to me to have a number of cases cited because it is difficult to reconcile them, but in the present case it is not so. It seems to me that the cases which have been cited to me form a continuous and uninterrupted current of authority, no one of them in any way contradicting or conflicting with the others. The last of these cases was Barnard v. Tomson (2). I do not propose to go into the facts of that case at any length, because when one comes to look at the judgment of NORTH, J., it is clear that he is only recognising and carrying out the principles which were laid down in the judgment delivered by MATHEW, J., in Re Sunderland 36th Universal Building Society (1). The view taken by NORTH, J., is that the line ought to be drawn at the time when a stoppage of the business has actually taken place, or it is recognised that the business must be stopped. In the case before him a report had been made by the accountants which had been rendered necessary by reason of certain defalcations of an officer of the society. It was a case in which undoubtedly the society had sustained great losses, and in which it might very well be a question whether the society ought not to dissolve and stop business. But the officers of the society in their report to the members had not recognised the necessity of stopping business; on the contrary, they showed that, after consideration, they thought on the whole the society had better go on. The final clause of their report stated that "There is no reason why the society should not with careful, judicious, and economical management, have a good future before it." This being a society in which a question had obviously been raised as to the desirability of stopping business, and the officers having reported against it, NORTH, J., says this ([1894] 1 Ch. at p. 390):

"The result is, that I can find nothing whatever prior to the instrument of dissolution, to indicate such a state of things as would put an end to the operation of the existing rules upon the principles laid down in the cases to which I have referred. I have no materials for drawing a line earlier than the date of the instrument of dissolution. It seems to me, therefore, that all the notices to withdraw are good down to that time."

What were the materials for which NORTH, J., looked, and which he says he could not find? I understand from his judgment that there had neither been a stoppage of business in fact, nor a recognition by the officers of the society that there must be a stoppage of business. He does not confine himself to the question whether the society was solvent or insolvent. That is not the question he put to himself. It seems to me plain that the question he put to himself was this, "has there been a stoppage in fact, or a recognition by the officers of the fact that there must be a

A stoppage?" There had not been a stoppage, and as to recognition by the officers of the fact that there must be a stoppage, they, although they considered the financial position of the society sufficiently grave, after they had considered the question, in the result reported against an immediate dissolution. NORTH, J., in saying that follows another decision—that of COLERIDGE, C.J., and MATHEW, J., in Re Sunderland 36th Universal Building Society (1).

B Let us see what the judges decided in that case. After stating that the persons who had given notice of withdrawal claimed that until a winding-up order had been actually made they were entitled to withdraw, and so to constitute themselves creditors of the societies, and that the liquidator on the other hand insisted that the societies were known to be insolvent on Feb. 17, and that the right which members would otherwise have had of quitting the societies was then at an end, C and after referring to the rule as to withdrawal, they say (24 Q.B.D. at p. 403):

"We are of opinion that this rule [i.e., the rule as to withdrawing members] was not intended to apply where the society was no longer able to carry on its business, and where it had become notorious that the society could not meet its liabilities. It would be altogether unreasonable to suppose that it was D intended in the event of insolvency to permit one set of members to escape liability at the expense of the others. There would seem to be no adequate consideration or motive for such an arrangement. The rule seems to us not to contemplate any such contingency as a suspension of its business, and, therefore, only to provide for a withdrawal from the society while it was, or was believed to be still solvent."

E There has been a good deal of argument before me as to what is the meaning of that judgment. In particular a question has been necessarily raised as to what the judges meant when they spoke of the society being no longer able to carry on its business, and of its being notorious that it could not meet its liabilities. I do not think the judges had the slightest intention in that portion of their judgment of defining what were the conditions the happening of which would bring to an end the F right of withdrawal. All that they meant to do by their judgment was to hold that in the particular case before them these conditions were present; that there was in fact a society unable to carry on its business, and that it had become notorious that the society could not meet its liabilities. I do not understand them to lay down any such rule as that the right to withdraw is dependent on the knowledge G either of the person giving notice of withdrawal or of the officers of the society of the insolvent condition of the society. I only understand them to say that those conditions were present in that case, and that being present the society must be considered as having stopped business or resolved to stop business at that date which they were then dealing with.

When I look at Walton v. Edge (3), in the House of Lords, and Carrick v. North British Building Society (4), the cases on which COLERIDGE, C.J., and MATHEW, J., H say their judgment is based, I find in them both that the real question propounded by the judges to themselves was "had there been a stoppage of business or anything that was equivalent to a stoppage of business," and they held that wherever there had been a stoppage of business, or anything equivalent to it, the right of withdrawal is determined. But it does not seem to me that insolvency, or even insolvency known to the officers of the society, is equivalent to a stoppage of business, I and I propose to deal with the present case on that basis. LORD SHAND, in Carrick v. North British Building Society (4), when he is dealing with it says (22 Sc.L.R. at p. 840):

"In the case of Tennent v. City of Glasgow Bank (5), in which a number of authorities were cited and considered as to the effect of the stoppage of a business on the declared insolvency of the company, it was held that no change could thereafter be made in reference to the rights or status of the members of the company, so that at least the rights of creditors might be preserved."

That seems to me to show that he recognised that the condition which would determine the right to withdraw was the stoppage of business or its equivalent.

I asked counsel for members who had given notice after the issue of the circular whether he would look at r. 21, and tell me what were the words he would introduce in order to give to the rule the construction which he says it ought to bear. The words he suggested were these: "Provided that this rule shall have no application when the state of the finances and business of the society is such that it cannot continue as a going concern, i.e., is no longer commercially solvent." I do not accept that proviso. I am not bound to invent a proviso for myself; but, if I had to do so I should be more inclined to insert this: "Provided that this rule shall have no application where the society has stopped business, or it is recognised by its officers that it must stop business." When it is considered who are the persons for the regulation of whose mutual rights r. 21 was passed, it seems plain that stoppage of business or recognition of the fact that stoppage of business is inevitable is the proper point at which to draw the line, and not insolvency. Let us remember what are the relations of these persons. They have in common put their capital into an adventure or concern which it was hoped would yield a profit. There is a proviso for withdrawal of capital. How long is the right to withdraw capital to continue? It must continue as long as the adventure continues, or its continuance is contemplated. But from the moment the adventure has come to an end, or it is recognised by the adventurers themselves or their officers that it must come to an end, every principle of justice requires that all who have joined in the common adventure shall in common bear the loss. That is the moment at which the rule ought to cease to operate—when the common adventure has come to an end, or it is recognised either by the members personally or by their officers that it must come to an end. From that time there ought to be no applications for withdrawal.

I have only further to ask myself the question, Had that point been arrived at in any of these cases? To my mind it clearly had been arrived at at the date of the resolution for dissolution Feb. 12; it does not seem arguable that the right of withdrawal continued after that. But when had it arrived prior to that date? It did not arrive simply because the society was insolvent. A company which is insolvent may still in the hands of sanguine adventurers carry on its business. It did not arrive when the directors published their report on Jan. 28, because, although the directors did not in this case, as in the case before NORTH, J., positively recommend the continuance of the business, they do clearly put it before the members as a matter in which it was perfectly reasonable for the members either to go on or to dissolve. Therefore, there was no recognition by that report of the necessity of stopping business. That being so, the next point is the issue of the circular. The issue of the circular carries it no further than the report. The report contemplated that the members would be called together to decide this question in one way or another, and the fact that the meeting was convened to consider it leaves the matter exactly where the report left it.

Under these circumstances, the conclusion I have come to is, that in Mrs. Lark's case there was not before the maturing of her notice on Feb. 7 or 10 either a stoppage of business or a recognition of the necessity for it, and she is entitled to be paid in full before the other non-borrowing members, and they must be paid pari passu without any priorities. I regard this society much as a partnership. An outgoing partner would be entitled to his costs out of the funds. These proceedings are the necessary complement of the dissolution, and the costs of all parties will come out of the funds.

Where a husband in divorce proceedings is awarded damages against the co-respondent, the co-respondent comes under a liability to the husband for which the husband can prove in the co-respondent's bankruptcy, but subject to the control of the court as to the application of the amount of the dividend received. This is so where the decree awarding the damages had been granted at the date of the receiving order, but the Divorce Court had not at that date made an order for payment of the damages to the petitioner.

Judgment Summons calling on the debtor to show cause why he should not pay the sum of £1,250, the amount of damages awarded to the petitioner in a case tried in the Divorce Court in which the debtor was the co-respondent, or in default be committed.

The damages were awarded on Feb. 27, 1897, and were ordered to be paid into court. On Oct. 6, 1897, the debtor filed his own petition in bankruptcy, and on the same day a receiving order was made. On Jan. 15, 1898, an order was made ordering the damages to be paid to the petitioner. There was evidence that the debtor was earning a large weekly salary. It was admitted that if the petitioner could prove for the amount of the damages awarded him the order asked for could not be made.

WRIGHT, J. This is a case of great difficulty and importance. I find that judges of great bankruptcy experience have refused to express any opinion on the point, but, as I do not think I could obtain any further light by consideration, I will decide it now.

It seems to me that where a husband comes as a petitioner into the Divorce Court and obtains his decree with damages against the co-respondent, he does acquire a right against the co-respondent to do as he pleases with the damages so awarded him, subject to the order of the court. He ought, therefore, in some sense to be said to be a creditor of the co-respondent in respect of the damages, although he is bound to apply them as ordered by the court, and that is a view which is in accordance with the decision of LORD PENZANCE in Wood v. Wood and Stanger (1).

It does not, however, follow that because a petitioner who has been awarded damages against a co-respondent is in some sense a creditor of the co-respondent after the decree, that he can be a petitioning creditor, or that he has a right of proof in bankruptcy. It was decided in Re Muirhead (2) that such a person cannot be a petitioning creditor in respect of damages which the Divorce Court has ordered to be paid to him on his undertaking to pay them into the registry to abide the further order of the court. But in deciding that case COCKBURN, C.J., uses language confining himself to the question before him, which was whether there was a good petitioning creditor's debt, and he decided that there was not, because the petitioner was only to receive the money for the purpose of paying it into court, and he likens him to a conduit-pipe of the court, or to a receiver. MELLISH, L.J., agreed with him, and at the close of his judgment said (2 Ch.D. at p. 28) :

"I do not mean at all to express any dissent or express any opinion as to the effect of such an order for the purpose of enabling a proof to be made. As at present advised, I should rather think that, there being a sum presently payable, and an order for its payment, it would be in some shape provable in bankruptcy, and that the mere uncertainty as to who was ultimately to receive it, and for whose benefit it was ultimately to be applied, would not prevent its being a provable debt."

Then comes Re Sacker (3), where it was held that a receiver appointed in an action in the Chancery Division was not a "creditor" entitled to present a bankruptcy petition; but that case does not carry the matter any further than the decision in Re Muirhead (2), for although LORD ESHER, M.R., uses language (22 Q.B.D. at p. 184) which says that a petitioner and receiver is not a "creditor," yet to the best of my judgment he only means a good petitioning creditor. FRY, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 185) :

"Whether the receiver could prove in respect of this sum in the bankruptcy of Sacker it is not necessary now to consider. As a general rule, a receiver cannot maintain an action to compel obedience to an order for the delivery of goods or the payment of money to him by a party to the action. There may, no doubt, be exceptional cases in which a receiver can bring an action in his

A own name—when, for instance, he is the holder of a bill of exchange. In that case he can maintain an action, not because he is a receiver, but because he is the holder of the bill. So, too, if he is possessed of chattels as receiver, and those chattels are unlawfully detained from him, he may well be able to maintain an action to recover them, as being the person in possession of them, quite independently of the fact that he is a receiver. And there may be other cases
B in which, having an independent cause of action, the fact that he is a receiver does not disqualify him from suing. But in such cases he does not sue in his character of receiver.”

This may apply to a person who has obtained a decree for damages against a co-respondent in the Divorce Court, and so the matter appears to be left open, for
C Patterson v. Patterson and Graham (4) does not help me, and I must give my decision in the absence of authority.

It seems to me that when a husband takes divorce proceedings against his wife and obtains his decree with damages against the co-respondent, although the damages are subject to the control of the court, the co-respondent is under a liability to the petitioner in respect of the damages for which the petitioner can
D prove in the co-respondent's bankruptcy. This application, therefore, cannot be sustained.

It is then said that as the order for the payment of the damages to the petitioner was not made till after the date of the receiving order, and, therefore, at the date of the receiving order, the petitioner had no interest in the damages and cannot prove for them in the bankruptcy. If I am right in the view I have taken on E the other part of the case, the same result follows. At the date of the receiving order the Divorce Court had not made an order for the payment of the damages to the petitioner, but the decree awarding the damages had been granted, and, in my judgment, that put the petitioner in a position to make a proof for the damages in the co-respondent's bankruptcy, subject, of course, to any order of the Divorce Court for application of any money received under it. This is a most difficult
F question, and it is one on which I entertain the greatest doubt.

I am not sure that there may not be some policies of insurance and policy moneys which might come within s. 3 (1). If a person insured the life of somebody else (he must, of course, have an insurable interest), and paid his premiums, and that other person died, that money might possibly be supposed to come within some of the other sections. I do not know whether it would, I do not myself think it would, but if it did, I think this s. 3 would prevent the duty being payable, and in that case one would have to read "the person under whose disposition the property passes" as covering the insurance company. In the case before us it is quite impossible to say it passed only by reason of the contract with the insurance company. It passes by reason of a considerable number of other circumstances. It seems to me that s. 3 is a general section which cannot be read so as to alter the effect of the specific sections which went before and which deal with policy moneys and policies of insurance, and, as I think, deal with them because they would have been of an ambiguous character if not specially dealt with.

On these grounds it seems to me that one is bound to say that this duty is given by sub-s. (1) (d), and that it is not prevented being given by s. 3.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DE PRÉVILLE

December 12, 20, 1899]

*Estate Duty—Passing of property—Property deemed to pass—Gift inter vivos—
Surrender of life interest—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 30), s. 2 (1) (c).*

Where a tenant for life of settled property has voluntarily surrendered his life interest in favour of the remainderman and dies within twelve months of such surrender, no estate duty is chargeable on the life estate of the deceased under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c).

Notes. The Finance Act, 1940, s. 43 (9 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 470), would apply to preserve the claim for estate duty (if any) which would arise in connection with the death of a life tenant but for the determination of his or her life interest within the five years preceding the death. This case is authority that prima facie (and subject to statute, e.g. the Finance Act, 1957, s. 38; 37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 279) the subject-matter of a gift must be in existence at the date of the death of the donor if the gift is to attract duty.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (DAY and LAWRENCE, JJ.), made on an information by the Attorney-General, reported [1899] 2 Q.B. 238.

E

The Divisional Court held that the Crown was entitled to estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, on the life estate of a deceased tenant for life of settled property who had surrendered his life estate to the remainderman and died within twelve months of such surrender. The facts appear in the judgment of A. L. SMITH, L.J.

Dec. 20, 1899. The following judgments were read.

G

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The real point on which the decision of this case turns is whether s. 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, imposes estate duty on a life estate which, prior to the passing of that Act, would not have had to be included in an account under s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, on the death of the tenant for life.

H

The facts are short. On and prior to Feb. 5, 1896, Georgiana Anne de Préville was tenant for life of real property situate in the county of Leicester, of which her son, the defendant, was tenant in tail, and on the day above named the mother and son executed a disentailing deed, by which the estate tail was barred, and the son thereupon became owner in fee of the property. On Dec. 11, 1896, ten months after the execution of this deed, the mother died. The question is whether the life estate of the mother, which had passed to her son ten months before her death, is liable to estate duty on her death.

I

It has been held in this court, affirmed in the House of Lords in the A.-G. v. Beech (1), that where the owner of a life estate has conveyed that estate to a donee more than twelve months before the death of the donor, estate duty on the life estate is not payable by the donee on the death of the donor, for the reason that by the Finance Act it is only the estate which passes on death which is liable to estate duty, and that when the donor, the tenant for life, died, nothing passed on which the estate duty could operate, for the life estate had already passed to the donee before the death of the donor. It is now said by the Crown that that decision does not apply, because in the present case the tenant for life died within twelve months of the gift, and not twelve months after the gift, as in the former case, and it is argued that upon this ground, by reason of the provisions of the remarkable s. 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, this case is different from A.-G. v. Beech

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of HAWKINS, J., reported [1895] 2 Q.B. 1, at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff was a dealer in live game and eggs, and in 1890 he engaged the defendant at a yearly salary as manager of a game farm. The contract of service was contained in three letters, in none of which was any reference made as to the names of the plaintiff's customers, nor about keeping their names secret or confidential. The defendant, as manager of the plaintiff's farm, had access to the books of the business, and he surreptitiously, without the knowledge of anyone, copied from these books a list of names and addresses of the plaintiff's customers and their keepers. In 1893, the defendant quitted the plaintiff's service, and set up a business of his own as a dealer in live game and eggs. He then used for the purposes of his business the list of names he had copied from the plaintiff's books. The plaintiff brought an action claiming damages, and an injunction restraining the defendant from using the information he had so obtained. HAWKINS, J., awarded the plaintiff £150 damages, ordered the defendant to deliver up to the plaintiff to be destroyed the list of names and addresses taken from the plaintiff's books, and granted an injunction restraining the defendant from making use of the information obtained by him by copying and extracting such names and addresses.

J. W. M'Carthy for the defendant.

R. M. Bray (Murphy, Q.C., with him) for the plaintiff.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The defendant had been a servant of the plaintiff, and had had access to an order-book of the plaintiff which contained a long list of the names of his customers with their addresses. Then the defendant, whilst in the plaintiff's service, took a copy of the list surreptitiously, that is to say, at times when he thought he would not be observed, and he took the copy, not for the purpose

A of using it for the advantage of the master he was serving, but for the purpose of keeping it, unknown to his master, and using it after he had left his master's service. His object in making and using the copy of the list of customers was to induce them to give up dealing with the plaintiff and to get them as customers of his own. What view should be taken of that act of the defendant with regard to the plaintiff, done while he was in the plaintiff's service? Would not any person of ordinary honesty say that it was a dishonest act by a servant towards his master? Was it not a dereliction by the defendant of his duty to act with good faith to the plaintiff? It seems to me that HAWKINS, J., was right in holding that the defendant had committed a breach of the trust reposed in him as a servant of the plaintiff, because he had no right to copy things out of the business books belonging to the plaintiff for the purpose of using his copy against his master after leaving his service.

C It is impossible not to say that it was a wrong thing to do and a breach of trust. But we must also decide whether it was a breach of contract. There was a contract in writing made between the plaintiff and defendant for the service of the plaintiff by the defendant, but there is nothing in the writing to show that a term that the servant shall act in good faith towards his master cannot be implied. Can the court imply such a term and add it to the contract? In my opinion, a stipulation to that effect is to be implied in every contract of service where there ought to be such faithful service. That stipulation must have been in the minds of both parties when making the contract of service. A master would not take a servant into his employ if the servant refused to agree to act honestly, and a servant must know that his master, who is going to engage him, relies on the faithful performance by him of the duties arising out of the confidential relations between them. This stipulation must have been in the minds of both the plaintiff and the defendant when they entered into the contract of service, and it is, therefore, a part of that contract. BOWEN, L.J., in Helmore v. Smith (2) and in Lamb v. Evans (1), was clearly of the same opinion. He says in the latter case ([1893] 1 Ch. at p. 229):

F "The common law, it is true, treats the matter from the point of view of an implied contract, and assumes that there is a promise to do that which is part of the bargain, or which can be fairly implied as part of the good faith which is necessary to make the bargain effectual. What is an implied contract or an implied promise in law? It is that promise which the law implies and authorises us to infer in order to give the transaction that effect which the parties must have intended it to have, and without which it would be futile."

G Now, a contract of service is a transaction of confidence and trust, and if a stipulation of faithful performance cannot be implied, the contract would be futile.

The rule laid down by BOWEN, L.J., seems to me to be an exceedingly good one, and the circumstances of the employment, that is to say, of the formation of the relations of master and servant, made this stipulation a term in the contract. In certain matters a servant is always in a confidential position as regards his master. H HAWKINS, J., was, therefore, right in holding that the defendant has committed a breach of his contract with the plaintiff, and in awarding damages to the plaintiff. There was a breach of confidence, and a breach of contract which produced damage to the plaintiff. Besides the damages the plaintiff is also entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from further breaches of his contract. Whether the form of the injunction which has been granted is right or not, it is unnecessary to say now. That is a question which will be decided should it hereafter become necessary to make any application to the court for the purpose of enforcing the injunction. I The appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—The defendant is appealing against the three parts of the judgment of HAWKINS, J., namely, against the judgment for £150 damages, against the order for the delivery up of the list copied out by the defendant, and against the injunction restraining him from making use of the list. The learned judge found as a fact that the defendant, whilst in the plaintiff's service, surreptitiously copied out of the plaintiff's books a list of customers dealing with the plaintiff with their addresses, and that he did this intending to use it, after leaving the plaintiff's service, in a rival business which he was going to set up so that he might try to draw these customers from the plaintiff and get them himself. The judge has held that that was done surreptitiously and in breach of the defendant's duty towards the plaintiff.

The granting of an injunction on the ground of a breach of the confidential relations existing between the plaintiff and the defendant is a very old method of relief. In Yovatt v. Winyard (3), which was decided in 1820, the plaintiff, who was the proprietor of certain veterinary medicines, employed the defendant as a journeyman under an agreement according to which he was to be instructed in the general knowledge of the business, but was not to be taught the mode of composing the medicines. After the defendant had left the plaintiff's service it was discovered by the plaintiff that the defendant, while in his service, had surreptitiously got access to his books of recipes and copied them, and had afterwards begun to sell the medicines. LORD ELDON granted an injunction restraining the defendant from using the recipes on the ground of there having been a breach of trust and confidence. The ground on which, in these matters, the court was granted an injunction is given by TURNER, V.-C., in Morison v. Moat (4). He says (9 Hare at p. 255):

"The plaintiff's case was rested in argument upon the ground that the defendant had obtained this secret by breach of faith or of contract on the part of Thomas Moat . . . The true question is whether, under the circumstances of this case, the court ought to interpose by injunction, upon the ground of breach of faith or of contract. That the court has exercised jurisdiction in cases of this nature does not, I think, admit of any question. Different grounds have indeed been assigned for the exercise of that jurisdiction. In some cases it has been referred to property, in others to contract, and in others, again, it has been treated as founded on trust or confidence—meaning, as I conceive, that the court fastens the obligation on the conscience of the party, and enforces it against him in the same manner as it enforces against a party to whom a benefit is given, the obligation of performing a promise on the faith of which the benefit has been conferred, but upon whatever grounds the jurisdiction is founded, the authorities leave no doubt as to the exercise of it."

Later the Vice-Chancellor refers (ibid. at p. 257) to the opinion expressed by LORD COTTENHAM in Prince Albert v. Strange (5), that a breach of trust, confidence, or contract would, of itself, entitle the plaintiff to an injunction. Then we come to Lamb v. Evans (1), where BOWEN, L.J., distinctly puts it on the ground that an implied contract arises from the confidential relations created between a master and his servant.

Whatever be the true ground, whether breach of confidence or breach of contract, the injunction must go. There was a clear breach of confidence here, since the defendant surreptitiously copied his master's books. As to any difficulty in the terms of the injunction, that will be set right when, if ever, any question arises about enforcing it.

As to the order for the delivery up to the plaintiff of the copy of the list made by the defendant, there can be no difficulty, because the making of that copy was clearly a breach of confidence. Then there is the question about the damages. That depends on whether there was any breach of contract, and it is clear from the judgments of BOWEN, L.J., that have been referred to, that there was an implied contract of faithful service, which the defendant has undoubtedly broken. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to damages, and the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that the judgment of the learned judge in the court below must be supported on the ground that the defendant has committed a breach of contract. This is a case of a contract of

A service which created the relation of master and servant between the plaintiff and the defendant, and I agree that, in that contract, a term should be implied that the servant should act with fidelity towards his master. That implication seems to me to be a necessary one for the support of the contract. The law has been so laid down in Lamb v. Evans (1) and in Louis v. Smellie (6).

B That being a term implied in the contract, the question is whether the defendant has acted with good faith towards the plaintiff. The learned judge states in his judgment that the defendant admitted that the copy was written by him when nobody saw him, and that his object was to use the names, and he confessed that he had regarded what he did as unfair and dishonourable, and that probably his master would have turned him away had he known of his misconduct. I do not agree with the opinion which the defendant expressed about this contract, that he did not think his employment was confidential, or that he was bound to protect his master's interest, as it was not expressly so said. I think that the defendant has acted with the worst faith towards his master. The judgment for the plaintiff was, therefore, right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

By an indenture of settlement made in pursuance of an agreement on his marriage, F. J. A. assigned a policy of insurance on his own life to trustees, covenanting to keep up such policy, on trust that they should receive the proceeds for the benefit of his wife for life and otherwise subject to the trusts therein contained. F. J. A. died in October, 1894, having kept up the premiums on the policy, the proceeds of which were received by the surviving trustees.

H

Held: estate duty was payable on the proceeds as constituting an "interest purchased or provided by the deceased" which accrued or arose on the death of the deceased within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d).

Information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty.

In September, 1866, a marriage was solemnised between Falconer John Atlee and Mary Dobree MacCall. Shortly before the marriage Falconer John Atlee effected a policy of assurance in La Nationale Insurance Office of France on Sept. 25, 1866, for 37,537 francs (£1,501 10s.) on his own life, and payable on his death to Mary Dobree MacCall, subject to a yearly premium of £50 payable by him during his life. By an indenture, dated Sept. 19, 1867, Falconer John Atlee assigned the policy to four persons, of whom the defendants were the survivors as trustees for the purposes of an indenture of settlement of Sept. 20, 1867, made between Falconer John Atlee of the first part, Mary Dobree Atlee, his wife, of the second part, J. F. Atlee of the third part, George MacCall of the fourth part, and R. O. Maughan, E. S. Claremont (both since deceased), and the defendants of the fifth part, whereby in pursuance of an agreement made previous to the marriage Falconer John Atlee assigned the policy of assurance to the parties thereto of the fifth part on the trusts thereafter declared concerning the same. By that settlement Falconer John Atlee covenanted with the trustees to keep up the policy and pay the premiums thereon during his life, and he did in fact keep up the same, and all premiums thereon were paid by him, and the moneys payable under the policy at his death were received by the defendants as the surviving trustees of the settlement of Sept. 20, 1867. It was declared by the settlement that the moneys to be received under the policy should be held by the trustees on trust for Mary Dobree Atlee for life; and the settlement contained a joint power of appointment by Falconer John Atlee and Mary Dobree Atlee in favour of their children over the trust funds, including the proceeds of the policy. By a joint appointment, dated Jan. 30, 1871, Falconer John Atlee and Mary Dobree Atlee appointed that part of the trust funds, including the proceeds of the policy, should be held in trust for their son, George Gordon Falconer Atlee, subject to the life interest of Mary Dobree Atlee. Falconer John Atlee died on Oct. 2, 1894, leaving Mary Dobree Atlee him surviving. It was alleged by the Crown that estate duty has become payable under s. 2 (1) (d) or the other provisions of s. 1 and s. 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, in respect of moneys received under the policy of assurance as property passing on the death of Falconer John Atlee within the meaning of those sections.

DARLING, J.—I think that our judgment must be for the Crown. The matter arises in this way: On a marriage in September, 1866, between a Mr. Atlee and a Miss MacCall, Mr. Atlee effected a policy of assurance, and he kept up that policy by means of paying a premium of £50 a year during his lifetime. In September, 1867, Mr. Atlee assigned that policy to four trustees, and they were the trustees for purposes of an indenture of settlement dated September, 1867. By that assignment he covenanted to do what he had already been doing, to pay the premiums so as to keep the policy alive, and that he did during his lifetime. Owing to an appointment in 1871, the policy became held in trust for a son of this marriage, a Mr. George Gordon Falconer Atlee, subject to a life interest which remained in Mrs. Atlee, who survived her husband, who created the policy.

A In those circumstances the Crown say that estate duty is payable in respect of something which Mrs. Atlee has received, viz., what she received in respect of this policy owing to the death of her husband, and it is said that the case comes within the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d). Section 2 provides :

B “Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say, . . . (d) : Any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased.”

Omitting the words which cannot apply to this, one has to consider whether what Mrs. Atlee got, or what the trustees got, on the death of Mr. Atlee can be
C described as “any interest purchased or provided by the deceased, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased.”

D It is said by counsel for the defendants that no beneficial interest passed at all on the death of Mr. Atlee; that all that he ever had was in the hands of trustees by virtue of the earlier settlement, and that he never had a “beneficial interest”; that something passed to Mrs. Atlee on his death, but it was not a beneficial interest; that what passed was, it is true, a benefit, an advantage, but then that is not taxed by the Act. Nothing is taxed unless it comes within the words

E “beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased.”

I think that it is material, to see exactly what this means, to look at s. 15 of the Act. In s. 2 (1) (d) not only interests are dealt with, but annuities are dealt with, and s. 15 enacts :

F “Estate duty shall not be payable in respect of a single annuity not exceeding £25 purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or arrangement with any other person, for the life of himself and of some other person and the survivor of them, or to arise on his own death in favour of some other person.”

G This is not an “annuity,” and all that is excepted there is an annuity, and not every annuity, but only an annuity of the value of not more than £25. But supposing everything in this case had been the same, except that the amount payable by the insurance company on the death of Mr. Atlee was not a lump sum, but an annuity during her life. What would have been the difference? All the requirements of s. 15 would be satisfied except that the amount would probably have been more than £25. What is there to show that sub-s. (1) (d) does not apply if an annuity has not been stipulated for, but a lump sum, all the other words being the same? I must say I can see nothing. It appears to me that s. 15 shows that what was done here results in a taxable beneficial interest arising on the death of the person who has insured his life for the benefit of his widow; that would certainly have been the case if the money paid by the insurance company had been secured to be paid in the way
H of an annuity. I cannot see anything which shows that this is not a beneficial interest arising on the death of Mr. Atlee simply because it was payable as a lump sum, whereas it apparently was considered by the legislature that it would be a beneficial interest arising on the death of Mr. Atlee if it had been, not a lump sum, but an annuity.
I

Counsel for the defendants contends further that, however this might have been, even if it would have been within sub-s. (1) (d) on the kind of reasoning that I have used, it is taken out of sub-s. (1) (d), and, indeed, altogether excused from taxation by virtue of s. 3 of the Finance Act, 1894. That section provides that

I do not think that this case comes within that provision. It seems to me that what was aimed at there was not a kind of thing that has happened here at all. What was aimed at was this: If a person has bought from another something, and has paid for that a price—a “consideration in money or money's worth”—but has not the immediate benefit of his purchase, and is not to get the immediate benefit of his purchase, except on the death of his vendor, then the legislature has simply said that in such a case no duty shall be payable on the death of the vendor. I do not think that s. 3 is intended to include such a transaction as this, which is not “property passing on the death of the deceased” by reason only of a bona fide purchase of the man under whose disposition the property passes. It seems to me that counsel's way of reading s. 3 and applying it to this case would be to read the word “from” in that section precisely as though it were the word “by,” to turn the section about and give it an operation which I cannot think it was ever intended to have.

For these reasons our judgment must be for the Crown.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that our judgment must be for the Crown on the ground that the duty which they claim is given by the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (d), and I think that it is not prevented from becoming due under the facts of the particular case by s. 3 of the same Act.

I confess that there is to my mind a little difficulty in fully following the exact literal words of LORD MACNAGHTEN's judgment in Earl Cowley v. I.R. Comrs. (1), as to cases falling within s. 1 and s. 2. It is quite true that, if one can arrive at the conclusion that the case falls within s. 1, then s. 2 may be said to be exclusive; one does not want s. 2. But one of the operations of s. 2 seems to me clearly to be to sweep into s. 1 some cases which might be doubtful on the construction of s. 1, but as to which s. 2 includes in clear words, and therefore brings them in to be subject to the duty whether they were in s. 1 on the true interpretation or not. The result of it is, if one comes to the conclusion that they were in s. 1, one would not want s. 2. I think that is what LORD MACNAGHTEN must have meant. At any rate it was not necessary to express any opinion contrary to that in the case before him.

In the present case the difficulty whether or not a policy of insurance at all (I am not dealing with any particular policy, but any policy) would come within s. 1 of the Finance Act is that on the death the property which the deceased had becomes more or less changed. He has got a policy which no doubt carries with it a right for somebody to receive at his death a certain sum of money; when his death happens, the sum of money is payable; and consequently that is a case in which two doubts may arise: first, whether it was within s. 1 at all, and, if it was, whether what was supposed to pass and be subject to the duty would be the value of the property which the deceased had—that is, the policy—which means, I suppose, the surrender value of the policy, or the principal value of the money. On those matters doubts might be entertained. It seems to me that s. 2 contains by reference to the incorporated Acts a distinct provision in reference to policies of insurance—i.e., by incorporating the clause of s. 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, which expressly deals with policies of insurance. Section 11 of the Act of 1889 was an amendment of s. 38 (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and s. 38 of the Act of 1881 was dealing with gifts. It made gifts inter vivos, under certain circumstances, liable to duty. On that section a doubt must have arisen between 1881 and 1889 as to what was the effect of a person giving policy moneys accruing on his death to somebody by keeping up the policy for his benefit, and it was considered that that was a case which would come in and be liable to duty as a gift, and accordingly, the third clause of s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1889 was passed, and it provides that where the policy of insurance is wholly kept up for the benefit of a donee, it is to be liable to the account duty.

"Donee" is a word which conveys a somewhat similar meaning to "volunteer," which is in the previous portion of the section. That is how the legislation stood with reference to the account duty. Then there comes the Finance Act, 1894, which is giving a different kind of duty, called the estate duty, but it is giving it—at any rate it is intended to give it—by sub-s. (1) (c) in respect of property as to which the account duty would be payable, and accordingly s. 38 of the Act of 1881 and s. 11 of the Act of 1889 are incorporated into s. 2 as covering property which is to be deemed to pass on the death for the purposes of estate duty; and at the same time a further amendment is made in those sections, and the further amendment is by cutting out the word "voluntary," the word "volunteer" and the reference to a "voluntary settlement."

That being so, one would expect, when the legislature was doing that, that they should also alter the word "donee" in the portion of s. 11 of the Act of 1889 which specially dealt with policies of insurance, because there would be no reason why, when they were making duty payable in cases where the person receiving the benefit was not merely a volunteer, they should keep in the word "donee" in the other section. We find that they do not expressly enact that, but they enact a new section and sub-section—namely, this sub-s. (1) (d), which deals with any annuity. An annuity, of course, had been one of the things which had been to a certain extent defined in those other sections, and it had been dealt with in the case of joint annuities, viz., annuities passing by survivorship. It goes on to bring in other interests, and it seems to me that sub-s. (1) (d) practically has the result—so far as regards policies of insurance—of taking away the effect of that word "donee" in the incorporated section. One would think that they might have done it, and I should think they would have done it, by express words if it had not been that it had been intended to sweep in, not merely policies of insurance, but other interests besides; and accordingly one finds apt words used for bringing in a policy of insurance which had been kept up for the benefit of the person who was not the donee, because there was some kind of consideration—the thing had been kept up for his benefit.

Accordingly it seems to me one would have no difficulty, so far, in saying that sub-s. (1) (d) applied, and applied to cases such as is before us; and s. 15 of the same Act throws very great light on it and greatly assists that construction. That brings us round to this: that in this particular case the policy moneys are made subject to duty by s. 2 (1) (d), provided only that there is nothing else which exempts them. Then we have to consider the question of the true construction of s. 3, which counsel for the defendants contends takes this particular policy out of the operation of the previous section. Section 3 (1) provides:

Suppose one applies that to the case of the policy of insurance, then, if one looks on the word "property" as referring to the policy of insurance, undoubtedly this policy of insurance (the right to it) did not pass on the death of the deceased at all; it passed on the settlement a good many years before. If, however, one reads the word "property" as referring to the £1,500 payable under it, then that passed on the death of the deceased because it became payable, and in that sense it passed; and it passed also on the death of the deceased, partly at any rate, by reason of a contract with the insurance company. The £1,500 was purchased by the premiums and it became payable on the death, and therefore counsel contends that the case in question comes within this section.

I am not sure that there may not be some policies of insurance and policy moneys which might come within s. 3 (1). If a person insured the life of somebody else (he must, of course, have an insurable interest), and paid his premiums, and that other person died, that money might possibly be supposed to come within some of the other sections. I do not know whether it would, I do not myself think it would, but if it did, I think this s. 3 would prevent the duty being payable, and in that case one would have to read "the person under whose disposition the property passes" as covering the insurance company. In the case before us it is quite impossible to say it passed only by reason of the contract with the insurance company. It passes by reason of a considerable number of other circumstances. It seems to me that s. 3 is a general section which cannot be read so as to alter the effect of the specific sections which went before and which deal with policy moneys and policies of insurance, and, as I think, deal with them because they would have been of an ambiguous character if not specially dealt with.

Surrender of life interest—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 30), s. 2 (1) (c).*

Where a tenant for life of settled property has voluntarily surrendered his life interest in favour of the remainderman and dies within twelve months of such surrender, no estate duty is chargeable on the life estate of the deceased under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c).

Notes. The Finance Act, 1940, s. 43 (9 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 470), would apply to preserve the claim for estate duty (if any) which would arise in connection with the death of a life tenant but for the determination of his or her life interest within the five years preceding the death. This case is authority that prima facie (and subject to statute, e.g. the Finance Act, 1957, s. 38; 37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 279) the subject-matter of a gift must be in existence at the date of the death of the donor if the gift is to attract duty.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of the Queen's Bench Division (DAY and LAWRENCE, JJ.), made on an information by the Attorney-General, reported [1899] 2 Q.B. 238.

The Divisional Court held that the Crown was entitled to estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, on the life estate of a deceased tenant for life of settled property who had surrendered his life estate to the remainderman and died within twelve months of such surrender. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20, 1899. The following judgments were read.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The real point on which the decision of this case turns is whether s. 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, imposes estate duty on a life estate which, prior to the passing of that Act, would not have had to be included in an account under s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, on the death of the tenant for life.

The facts are short. On and prior to Feb. 5, 1896, Georgiana Anne de Préville was tenant for life of real property situate in the county of Leicester, of which her son, the defendant, was tenant in tail, and on the day above named the mother and son executed a disentailing deed, by which the estate tail was barred, and the son thereupon became owner in fee of the property. On Dec. 11, 1896, ten months after the execution of this deed, the mother died. The question is whether the life estate of the mother, which had passed to her son ten months before her death, is liable to estate duty on her death.

It has been held in this court, affirmed in the House of Lords in the A.-G. v. Beech (1), that where the owner of a life estate has conveyed that estate to a donee more than twelve months before the death of the donor, estate duty on the life estate is not payable by the donee on the death of the donor, for the reason that by the Finance Act it is only the estate which passes on death which is liable to estate duty, and that when the donor, the tenant for life, died, nothing passed on which the estate duty could operate, for the life estate had already passed to the donee before the death of the donor. It is now said by the Crown that that decision does not apply, because in the present case the tenant for life died within twelve months of the gift, and not twelve months after the gift, as in the former case, and it is argued that upon this ground, by reason of the provisions of the remarkable s. 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, this case is different from A.-G. v. Beech

(1), and that estate duty is leviable on the life estate on the death of the tenant for life. The Crown admits that if s. 2 (1) (c), of the Finance Act, 1894, does not impose this duty on the life estate on the death of the tenant for life, there is no other section which does.

Section 2 (1) (c) provides :

“Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words ‘voluntary’ and ‘voluntarily’ and a reference to a ‘volunteer’ were omitted therefrom.”

In A.-G. v. Earl Grey (2) I expanded this composite section, and I will do so again so far as material to this case. It then reads as follows: “Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, which, as amended, enacts that real or personal property to be included in an account shall be property of the following description—viz., any real or personal property taken under a disposition made by a person dying on or after June 1, 1881, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, which shall not have been bona fide made twelve months before the death of the deceased.” Section 38 of the Act of 1881 is one of a group of sections under the heading “Stamps” which relates to the taking out of probate and letters of administration of the estate and effects of deceased persons—i.e., of property which deceased persons die possessed of, or leave behind them, and it seems to me that this group of sections has nothing to do with property a deceased person has not left behind him, excepting cases in which a deceased person would have left property behind him had he not given it away before he died. It is only as regards such cases that an account is to be rendered. Section 38 being one of the sections in this group, what is its true reading? Does it mean that a life estate—which of necessity comes to an end on the death of the tenant for life, and which never under any circumstances can come into an account on the death of the tenant for life—is nevertheless to be brought into an account if the deceased has given it away less than twelve months before death, or is its true reading that, if there be property which would come into an account on death if it had not been given away, that property must be brought into an account if the deceased has given it away less than twelve months before death?

Considering that the group of sections in the Act of 1881 is dealing with the property of which deceased persons in fact die possessed, or would have died possessed if they had not given it away, in my opinion it is not the true reading of s. 38 that property must be brought into an account no matter whether it would or would not have had to be brought into an account if it had not been given away within twelve months of the death. It is only to be brought into an account if it would have had to be so brought but for the gift. In my judgment this section is to prevent persons giving away property less than twelve months before death which otherwise would have to be included in an account, and thus escape the duty. It is not disputed by the Crown that the life estate in the present case could never have been included in an account, for on the death of the owner of this life estate, even if it had not been given to the son, it ipso facto came to an end, and there was, therefore, nothing whatever to bring into an account.

For these reasons s. 2 (1) (c) in my judgment does not bring about what is contended for by the Crown, and, as before stated, there is no other section which does so. I need not discuss Cowley v. I.R. Comrs. (3), for it has no bearing on the point which I have to decide, and I think that the Crown is wrong. I cannot agree with the Divisional Court, though on what ground that court decided in favour of

A the Crown I do not know, for it has not told us. I think this appeal must be allowed.

HENN COLLINS, L.J.—I regret very much that the Divisional Court has not given any reasons for its decision in this case, for I must confess that I have had very serious misgivings whether the property in question does not come within the express words of s. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, and therefore, in a taxing Act, must be held liable for the duty.

It seems to me that prima facie the life estate here is property, and it was taken under “a voluntary disposition made by a person, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise.”

It seems to me to come prima facie within those words, and the question is whether, in construing a taxing Act, it would be justifiable to apply what might be regarded as the general spirit of the Act as against the express words of the section. May not the Act have done this—have enacted that, if any person chooses in his lifetime to give away that which would not have survived his death, if he had not given it away, he must do so at the risk of estate duty having to be paid on it if he dies within twelve months of the gift? However, that point has been dealt with in the judgment that has just been delivered, and more fully in the judgment prepared by my brother WILLIAMS, which I have had the advantage of seeing, and I am content to adopt the reasoning of those judgments on the point. I therefore agree in the decision which is pronounced by the other members of the court.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The decision in this case depends, it seems to me, on the meaning of the word “property” in s. 38 (2) (a) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881. Does property there mean any property, irrespective of the interest of the deceased therein? Or is it limited to property in which the deceased had an interest which by its nature might continue after the death of the deceased—i.e., property capable of devolution as estate of a deceased, or, in other words, an interest not limited to determine with the life of the deceased?

“As I understand the principle of all fiscal legislation, it is this: If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. . . . In other words, if there be admissible, in any statute, what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute.”

On the other hand, a taxing Act is to be construed on the same principle and by the same rules as any other Act: Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lucas (5), 51 L.J.Q.B. at p. 118, per BRETT, L.J. For instance, I suppose that if on the ordinary rules of construction general words would be limited on the ejusdem generis doctrine by preceding particular words, this construction would be applied in a taxing statute equally with any other statute.

In the present case there is nothing to be found in the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, limiting the ordinary legal meaning of the word “property”; but the statute refers to antecedent legislation—that is to say, to the statutes beginning with the Stamp Act, 1815, and coming down to the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1880, granting the Crown certain duties in respect of the value of the estate and effects of deceased persons, and provides for an inventory or account being made by the executor or administrator of such estate and effects, and s. 38 deals with what shall be included, and says in effect that it shall include not only property forming part of the estate and effects of the deceased at his death, but also property which he has parted with within three (now twelve) months before his death. Must not this mean, according to the ordinary rules of construction, property of the same kind as that dealt with in the antecedent legislation? That is to say, property in which the deceased had such an interest that, if he had not parted with it by a gift within twelve months before his death, it would have been estate and effects of the deceased, and therefore have been included in the property on the value of which the duty was granted?

It is clear in the antecedent legislation that no duty was granted in respect of property the interest of the deceased in which terminated with his life, for the duty was in respect of property as being estate and effects, of a deceased; and must not the word "property" in subsequent legislation be read in the same sense? On the whole, I think it must, and I find nothing in the Finance Act, 1894, generally, or in s. 2 (1) (c), to enlarge the sense in which the word "property" is used in the probate duty legislation and the account to be rendered thereunder. The Probate Duty Acts prior to 1881 dealt with property capable of devolution as part of the estate and effects of a deceased at death; for it dealt with property which in fact devolved as such estate at death. Then comes the statute of 1881, which says that the tax shall apply to property which does not in fact devolve at death, but, shortly before death, is transferred by what purports to be a gift inter vivos, but which property, the statute says, shall be taxed in the same manner as property in fact devolving at death. Surely, according to the ordinary rules of construction, the word "property" in the statute of 1881 must be limited to property in its nature capable of devolution as part of the estate and effects of a deceased. Thus to construe the word "property" in s. 38 (2) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, is only to apply the ordinary rule of construction, that words in the same and in cognate connected Acts must be presumed to have the same meaning.

Case Stated by Cheshire Quarter Sessions.

B The defendant James Davies, was charged before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, with an offence under s. 4 for the Gaming Houses Act, 1854 [repealed], and William Wild and Thomas Baker, with aiding and abetting him in the commission of the offence. They elected to be tried by a jury, and an indictment was accordingly preferred against all three defendants. The first and fifteenth counts charged Davies with being the occupier of a certain house and room, and unlawfully opening such house and room for the purpose of unlawfully gaming; and the third count charged that he, being the occupier of a certain house, did unlawfully use the said house for the purpose of unlawful gaming being carried on therein. The seventh count charged him with so using a room in the house. Other counts charged C Wild and Baker with aiding and abetting Davies, but the jury acquitted both these defendants.

D The facts stated in the Case were as follows. Wild was a publican and kept the Grove Inn, Stockport. On Dec. 6, Davies being in the inn at closing time, invited Wild, Baker, and one Chappell, to play cards at his house. On arriving at Davies' house the four played whist. Subsequently they played at a game called "German Bank," and again at another called "Nap." The game of "German Bank" was described by witnesses to the jury, and the Chairman in his charge put the following questions to the jury :

E (i) Was the defendant Davies the occupier of the house and room?—Answer : Yes. (ii) Did he open them on the occasion in question for the purpose of unlawful gaming?—Answer : No. (iii) Did he use them on the occasion for the purpose of unlawful gaming?—Answer : Yes. (iv) Was the game of "German Bank" as played on the occasion an unlawful game?—Answer : Yes. (v) Was the house used as a "common gaming house," or was it on the evidence only used on the occasion in question for the purpose of playing an unlawful game?—Answer : It was used as such only on the occasion."

F Upon these findings a verdict of Guilty was entered against Davies upon the third and seventh counts, and of acquittal upon the rest.

Honoratus Lloyd for the Crown.

The defendant was not represented.

G LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—We think that this conviction cannot be supported. These persons were not strangers but friends. Being together in a public-house when closing time comes, there is a proposition that they shall have a game of cards, and they go, taking refreshments with them, to Davies' house. They begin to play whist, and they play whist for some time, until Chappell, being dissatisfied with his partner, refuses to continue the game, when they play H "German Bank." As to what "German Bank" is, is not clearly stated in the case but looking at the Gaming Houses Act, 1854, it would be monstrous to say that the defendant had opened or used his house for the purpose of unlawful gaming. It seems impossible to say that the room was "used" within the meaning of the statute. Again the jury were asked "is German Bank an unlawful game?" That was not a question of fact for the jury, but of law for the judge. The jury found no I verdict, but merely answered the questions left to them. The duty of a jury is to determine the question "Guilty" or "Not guilty," and, although it is not unusual to ask questions of the jury, unquestionably it is proper to get the verdict of the jury "Guilty" or "Not guilty," on the direction of the judge.

Food and Drugs—Offence—Justices “having jurisdiction in the place” of the offence—Jurisdiction of county justices.

Food and Drugs—Samples for analysis—Purchase otherwise than for the purpose of analysis—Need for purchaser to comply with provisions as to samples taken for analysis—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 63), s. 14.

The appellant, under a contract for the regular supply of butter, supplied butter which was later found to contain a quantity of margarine, but it was not bought with the intention of submitting it to analysis. It was delivered in a borough which did not have a separate court of quarter sessions, and the appellant was convicted by the county justices of an offence under the Margarine Act, 1887. On appeal, the question arose whether the county justices were “justices having jurisdiction in the place where the article was actually delivered,” and further whether a prosecution could be brought as the appellant had not been notified forthwith that the purchaser intended to have the butter analysed in accordance with the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 14 [repealed and replaced in different terms by the Food and Drugs Act, 1955, s. 93].

Held: (i) the county justices had jurisdiction as there was no separate court of quarter sessions in the borough; and (ii) it was not necessary to notify the appellant of an intention to have the butter analysed, as the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 14, applied only where the purchaser bought with the intention of obtaining an analysis, and not to a contract for the delivery of provisions which might extend over a considerable period of time, nor to cases where provisions were purchased from time to time in small bulk without any suspicion at the time of purchase of any deceit being practised by the seller.

Case Stated by the justices for Lindsey, in the county of Lincoln.

On the hearing of an information preferred before the justices it was proved that the appellant, a grocer in the borough of Louth, had entered into a contract with the guardians of the poor of the Louth Union for the supply to them of "good fresh butter, English;" that on Saturday, Dec. 8, 1894, the appellant, under his contract, delivered 39lb. of butter (or margarine) at the union workhouse in Louth; that on the following Monday, Dec. 10, 1894, the butter (or margarine) was examined by the workhouse visiting committee, and 1lb. of it was, on the same day, in the absence of the appellant, divided into three parts, each part being wrapped in a separate paper. One part was taken by the master of the workhouse to the appellant's shop at Louth, and, the appellant not being there at the time, the master left it with a letter, of which the following is a copy:

"Dec. 10, 1894.—At a meeting of the house committee of the Louth Union this morning the butter supplied by you was examined, and a pound of it cut into three parts; one of such parts will be sent to an analyst, one will be kept by the guardians, and the third I have been instructed to bring to you.—I am, Sir, most respectfully yours,

JOHN T. CROWSON, Master."

The butter or margarine was sold by retail otherwise than in a package duly branded or durably marked in the manner prescribed by s. 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887, and the appellant did not deliver the same to the purchaser in or with a paper wrapper on which was printed in capital letters, not less than a quarter of an inch square, "Margarine." It was also proved that by the directions of the guardians one of the sealed samples of butter (or margarine) was sent by post (registered) to Dr. Muter, public analyst for the administrative county of the Parts of Lindsey, and a certificate from him was produced in which he stated that the sample of butter received from the guardians of the Louth Union for analysis, in his opinion, contained seventy-five parts of butter and twenty-five parts of margarine.

On the above facts it was contended for the appellant before the justices, that the justices, being county justices, had no jurisdiction to determine the case on the ground that the workhouse of the Louth Union and the place where the goods were supplied from and delivered to the purchasers, and the place where the defendant lived and carried on business, were situated within the borough of Louth, and that the proceedings should have been taken before the magistrates for the borough of Louth, and that s. 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, applied. In answer to this the respondent contended that the justices had jurisdiction on two distinct grounds: (i) that the borough of Louth being one of the parishes comprised in the Louth Union, s. 27 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867, applied to these proceedings; and (ii) that, as no separate court of quarter sessions had been granted to the borough of Louth, the county justices have concurrent jurisdiction (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 111, repealed, but re-enacted in s. 154 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882). It was also contended for the appellant that the summons had not been legally issued, and that the Margarine Act, 1887, required the same steps to be taken as were required in proceedings under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879, and that this had not been done, as the alleged offence was committed on Dec. 8, 1894, and the summons issued and served on Jan. 18, and returnable and heard on Jan. 23, 1895, and therefore, more than twenty-eight days after the purchase, contrary to the provisions of s. 10 of the Act of 1879, applying to the purchase of perishable articles for test purposes. In answer to this objection it was contended for the respondent: (i) that s. 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, did not apply to proceedings under the Margarine Act, 1887; (ii) that butter is not a perishable article within the meaning of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875; and (iii) that the butter (or margarine) in question was not purchased for "test purposes." It was also contended for the appellant that it was necessary to the proceedings that there should be notification forthwith, as required by s. 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and also that there ought to have been an offer to divide the article in the presence of the defendant or his agents then and there, that each part should be marked and sealed, and that the letter of Dec. 10, 1894, was not a sufficient notification as to analysis. To this objection it was contended for the respondent that s. 14 did not apply to these proceedings, inasmuch as the butter (or margarine) was not purchased "with the intention of submitting the same to analysis."

The justices were of opinion (i) that, as justices for the Parts of Lindsey in the county of Lincoln, they had concurrent jurisdiction with the borough justices in the borough of Louth (such borough not having a separate court of quarter sessions), and that they had also jurisdiction under s. 27 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867; (ii) that the Margarine Act, 1887, does not require the same steps to be taken as are required in proceedings under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879; (iii) that butter is not a "perishable article" within the meaning of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act; (iv) that the butter (or margarine) was not purchased for "test purposes"; and (v) that s. 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, does not apply to these proceedings for the reason that the article was not purchased "with the intention of submitting the same to analysis." The justices convicted the appellant, and imposed a fine of £5, and a sum of £1 15s. 6d. for costs.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (i) Whether the justices had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case; (ii) Whether the Margarine Act, 1887, required the same steps to be taken as were required in proceedings under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 and 1879; (iii) Whether s. 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, was applicable, the article not having been purchased with the intention of submitting the same to analysis.

A Dec. 7, 1895. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., read the following judgment of the court in which, after stating the facts as set out, he proceeded: The first point raised by the appellant was that the justices, being county justices, had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, on the ground that, under s. 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, the proceedings should have been commenced before the magistrates for the borough of Louth, in which was situate B the workhouse "where the article sold was actually delivered to the purchaser." The section runs thus:

C "When the analyst, having analysed any article, shall have given his certificate of the result, from which it may appear that an offence against some one of the provisions of this Act has been committed, the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings for the recovery of the penalty herein imposed for such offence before any justices in petty sessions assembled having jurisdiction in the place where the article or drug sold was actually delivered to the purchaser, in a summary manner."

D It should first of all be noticed that the section merely says "may take proceedings," but, further, I think that under s. 27 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1867, and s. 111 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (repealed, but in substance re-enacted in s. 154 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882), the justices clearly had jurisdiction. [His Lordship stated that, as the justices had found as a fact that the article was not perishable, and that it had not been bought for test purposes, it was unnecessary for the prosecution to be brought within twenty-eight days under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, s. 10, and continued]:

E I now come to the substantial question raised by the appellant—viz., whether compliance with s. 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, is necessary as a condition precedent to a prosecution under the Act. Proceedings under the Margarine Act, 1887, are by s. 12 of that Act to be the same as prescribed by ss. 12 to 28 inclusive of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. Section 14 of the F latter Act is as follows:

G "The person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, forthwith notify to the seller, or his agent selling the article, his intention to have the same analysed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts, to be then and there separated, and each part to be marked and sealed or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall, if required to do so, proceed accordingly, and shall deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent."

H It is clear that if that section is applicable to this case its provisions were not complied with, and the conviction by the magistrates is wrong. But is it so applicable? I think not, for the margarine in question was not purchased by the guardians "with the intention of submitting the same to analysis." It was delivered to them, as the case states, under a contract for the regular supply to them of good fresh butter.

I But the appellant's contention is, that a prosecution for an offence against the Act can only be maintained where a sample has been purchased whether by an officer under the Act or by a private individual with a view of submitting the same to analysis. With this contention I do not agree, though it must be confessed the question is by no means free from the difficulty which constantly arises in construing many Acts of Parliament—namely, the difficulty of reconciling several different and loosely-drawn sections. I cannot think, having regard to the scope of the Margarine Act and to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act and to the offences set out in s. 6 of the latter and ss. 6 and 7 of the former Act, that it was the intention of the legislature that a prosecution should be confined within such narrow limits as those contended for. For example, by s. 7 of the Margarine Act, “every person dealing with, selling, or exposing, or offering for sale, or having in his possession for the purpose of sale any quantity of margarine contrary to the provisions of the Act shall be liable to conviction for an offence against the Act.”

Could anything be wider than this? And yet can it in reason be said to be necessary that, for the purposes of a prosecution for “exposing, or offering for sale, or for having in his possession for the purpose of sale,” a sample shall have been purchased for the purpose of analysis and analysed as described in the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 14? The Margarine Act does not limit the initiation of a prosecution to the purchase of a sample with a view to analysis; and, having regard to the offences the Margarine Act was aimed at and to its preamble, I cannot think it was so intended.

The chief difficulty is raised by ss. 20 and 21 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which, dealing generally with proceedings under the Act, certainly at first sight seem to imply that the formalities prescribed by s. 14 have taken place. It seems to me, however, that the effect of s. 21 is merely to make the production of a certificate of an analyst under s. 14 of itself sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated. There is nothing in the Act to prevent the proof of an offence by other satisfactory evidence, nor is it necessary that the purchaser should obtain the certificate of the “public analyst” except where he purchases “with an intention” of submitting to analysis. Section 12 merely gives him the right on certain payments to claim an analysis from the public analyst. Finally, it may be pointed out that by s. 28 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, nothing in the Act is to “take away any other remedy against an offender under this Act.”

On this part of the case two decisions were cited to us—one, Parsons v. Birmingham Dairy Co. (2), in which FIELD and CAVE, JJ., not expressly, but inferentially, decided that s. 14 applies to every purchaser, whether purchasing with the intention of obtaining an analysis or not; the other, Enniskillen Union Guardians v. Hilliard (1), in which DOWSE, B., and ANDREWS, J., expressly dissented from that decision. I wish to say that I agree with the reasoning of the learned judges in the Irish case, and I entirely adopt the view of the Act expressed by them. It seems to me that to adopt the contention of the appellant in this case would be to largely restrict the operation of a salutary Act, and to exclude that class of cases of which the present is an example, where there is a contract for the delivering of provisions within the Act, which may extend over a considerable period of time, and also the class of cases in which provisions are purchased from time to time in small bulk without any suspicion at the time of purchase of any deceit being practised by the seller. I cannot think this is the true construction of the Act. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

The captain of a torpedo boat, built in England for the Japanese government, who was an officer in the Japanese navy, engaged the plaintiff, a British subject, to serve in the vessel on the voyage from England to Japan at an agreed wage for the whole voyage. While the vessel was on the voyage, the Japanese government declared war against China, which, besides making the voyage dangerous, also made it illegal under the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, for the plaintiff to continue to serve on board the ship. The plaintiff, having been warned of these matters, left the vessel at Aden.

Held: in the circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to leave the vessel before the completion of the voyage and to recover the full amount of the agreed wage.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Divisional Court (LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., and CHARLES, J.), reported [1895] 2 Q.B. 70, affirming the decision of the county court judge, holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the whole of the agreed wage for the voyage from England to Japan.

The defendants built a torpedo boat, called the Tatsuta, in the Tyne for the Japanese government. By the contract the Tatsuta was to be delivered to the Japanese government in the Tyne. By a subsequent contract the defendants agreed to have the Tatsuta taken to Japan for an agreed sum. The defendants engaged Captain Strannach to navigate the Tatsuta to Japan. Captain Strannach engaged a crew, one of whom was the plaintiff, whose wages were to be £30 for the voyage. Of this sum £8 was to be paid five days after sailing, and was so paid. When the Tatsuta sailed from the Tyne, Captain Strannach hoisted the Japanese flag, and a pennant, and continued to fly the Japanese flag until the vessel reached Aden. The meaning of this was that he took command as a captain in the navy of the Japanese government, and therefore, although the captain was for some purposes in the employ of the defendants, he was not solely in their employ, but was also in the service of the Japanese government. His exact position, however, was not clearly proved, although the county court judge described him as "the agent, representative and servant of the Japanese government." Japan was then at peace, but she declared war against China before the Tatsuta reached Gibraltar. There news of the declaration of war was conveyed to Captain Strannach. When the vessel reached Aden, she was boarded by the captain of a Queen's ship, who read the proclamation of neutrality under the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, and warned the crew, who were British subjects, of the risks they would run and the penalties they might incur by continuing to serve on the ship. Captain Strannach told the crew that "the run was at an end," and that he would take them on under a new agreement for a month. He also said that he had a private telegram, and alone knew whither the vessel would proceed. The plaintiff and other members of the crew refused to continue the voyage, and left the ship. The governor at Aden provided them with money to pay their passage home to England, it being impossible for them to get employment on another ship at Aden.

The plaintiff sued the defendants to recover £22, the balance of his agreed wages, £8 having been paid in advance. Before the trial of the action it had been agreed between the parties that the defendants would be liable if and so far as Captain Strannach would be liable if he were the defendant. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of £22, the balance of his agreed wages. The Divisional Court, on appeal, affirmed the judgment of the county court judge. The defendants appealed, with leave.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case an action was brought by a seaman who entered into a contract with the captain of a ship to serve on the ship on a voyage from Newcastle to Japan. It has been agreed that this action is to be tried as if the seaman had brought it against the captain. The plaintiff's case, therefore, is that the defendants employed him to be a seaman in the ship on a voyage from Newcastle to Japan; and that during the voyage the Japanese government, which they were serving, declared war against China, and he would have thereby had to continue the voyage on board a ship of war; and that that altered his position, and exposed him to two risks, one at the hands of the Chinese, and the other at home for breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, by continuing upon a Japanese warship after Japan was at war and he knew of that fact. That is the plaintiff's case. If it is true, it cannot be denied that, by the action of the Japanese government, the voyage was altered and the plaintiff had a right to quit the ship without forfeiting any of his agreed wages. The dispute at the trial was, whether the captain was the servant of the Japanese government or of the defendants. The learned county court judge found in favour of the seaman, and there has been an appeal to the Divisional Court, and now to this court. The appeal is really upon a question of fact. There is no doubt as to the law. If the ship was a Japanese warship under the command of a captain in the service of the Japanese government, the plaintiff is right.

This ship was built by the defendants for Japan, to be a war vessel of the Japanese government, and an agreement was made that the defendants should have her taken to Japan. To carry out that agreement, the defendants made an agreement with the captain to take the ship to Japan and there deliver her to the Japanese. He was to command the ship and take her to Japan. If that were all, and if the captain had proceeded to carry out that contract, the ship would not have been a Japanese war vessel, but would have been under the sole control of the defen-

A dants' captain, and the declaration of war would not have enabled the English government to stop the ship at Aden, and, if the plaintiff left the ship before the end of the voyage, he could not recover at all.

But, in my opinion, agreeing with the county court judge and the Divisional Court, I think that more has been established as to the relation between the captain and the Japanese government than is contained in the agreements. Enough was established before the county court judge to justify his finding. In the Divisional Court the court said: "But we think enough was established as to his relation to that government to render further inquiry unnecessary." The captain did enter into the relation of being a captain acting for the Japanese government. The inference is irresistible that he did so with the knowledge and consent of the defendants and of the Japanese government.

C The relation, therefore, was established between the captain and the Japanese government, as found by the Divisional Court. What enabled them so to find was the fact that the captain immediately adopted the ship as a Japanese man-of-war, and acted as the captain of a Japanese warship flying the Japanese flag and hoisting a pennant. The meaning of that was that he took command as a captain in the navy of the Japanese government. The nautical meaning of those acts is well known.

D He could not say in a plainer manner that he was in the service of the Japanese government. The defendants knew all this, and all parties agreed that the captain should take command as a captain of the Japanese government. There was no harm in that so long as the Japanese were not at war. A British seaman might serve on such a ship when his employers were not at war. But the Japanese declared war, and thereby the captain went to war also. He had made an agreement with the seaman which was lawful when it was made; but, upon the declaration of war, the seaman became liable to penalties because he was an English subject on board a foreign ship of war during war. Therefore, when war was declared by the government under which the captain was serving, and that was made known to the seaman, he was in danger, and was not bound to go any further.

E The employers of the captain converted a harmless voyage into a dangerous voyage, and thereby entitled the seaman to say that the ship had been turned into a ship of war at war, and that he would not continue the voyage. That is the ground of the judgments of the courts below, and I cannot disagree with the decision of the county court judge or that of the Divisional Court, where it was said:

G "The exact position, however, of the captain was not clearly proved, and, although the judge in his judgment describes him as the agent, representative, and servant of the Japanese government, we are informed that no admission of the accuracy of this description was made by the defendants at the trial. But we think enough was established as to his relation to that government to render further inquiry unnecessary."

H The seaman, therefore, was entitled to leave the ship, and to recover all his wages. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

I KAY, L.J.—This is a case of some difficulty, not on account of any question of law, but upon the facts. I will refer only to the most important facts. The ship was built as a torpedo boat for the Japanese government, and became the property of the Japanese government when she was at Newcastle. The contract for building the ship having been completed, a new contract was made to send the ship to Japan, and the Japanese paid the defendants a lump sum for that service. Thereupon the defendants agreed with a captain to take the ship out to Japan. The captain engaged a crew, including the plaintiff, to work the ship on the voyage to Japan. In the contract with the plaintiff it was agreed that he was to be paid £30 for the whole voyage to Japan, of which £8 was to be payable five days after sailing, and the remainder on the completion of the voyage. The ship left Newcastle for Japan. It is not denied that she had the Japanese flag flying all the way to Aden. That flag must have been flying with the knowledge of the defendants, and probably by the direction of the agent of the Japanese government. At Gibraltar the captain had news of the declaration of war. At Aden, the consequence of proceeding with the voyage was made plain—that the crew would be involved in war, and would be liable to the penalties of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The plaintiff in his evidence gave an account of what passed between the captain and the crew at Aden. The captain said he had his private instructions; that the run was finished; and that he would engage them at monthly wages. There is no contest as to that evidence. There was, therefore, a complete alteration of the nature of the voyage, making the remainder of the proposed voyage very risky; there were the risks of war, and of punishment under the Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870.

The law applicable to the case is quite plain. It is laid down in the words of BLACKBURN, J., in Appleby v. Myers (1), where he says (L.R. 2 C.P. at p. 661):

“The plaintiffs having contracted to do an entire work for a specific sum, can recover nothing unless the work be done, or it can be shown that it was the defendant’s fault that the work was incomplete, or that there is something to justify the conclusion that the parties have entered into a fresh contract.”

Upon the evidence the captain put an end to the contract which he had made, and the case seems to come exactly within the words of BLACKBURN, J., which I have quoted. The completion of the voyage was prevented by the captain. Further, the nature of the voyage was so altered that the seaman had a right to say that he would not go on if the captain was in the service of the Japanese government, because the Japanese government by their own act had made the nature of the voyage different.

Was the captain the servant of the Japanese government? It is said that he was engaged by the defendants under a written contract. That, however, was not all. The Japanese flag was hoisted. Therefore, although the captain was, for some purposes, in the employ of the defendants, he was not solely in their employ, but was also in the service of the Japanese government. By the act of the Japanese government the seaman became entitled to say that he would not proceed further, and the completion of the voyage was prevented, for the purpose of this case, by the act of the defendants. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to recover the whole of his wages. No argument has been pressed here as to the further damages. I think that the decision of the county court judge and of the Divisional Court was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This case is to be treated as if the action were brought against the captain. The plaintiff had made a contract to serve on the ship from Newcastle to Japan. He sues in this action to recover the whole of his agreed wages for the voyage. He served only as far as Aden, and there left the ship because of the war which had been declared between Japan and China.

The sole question is whether there was evidence in this case on which the court could hold that the captain of the ship was, when he took her out of Aden, in the service of the Japanese government. The completion of the voyage was prevented by the Japanese government declaring war, the nature of the voyage being quite changed by that act. I think that the judgment of the county court judge proceeded upon the assumption that the captain was in the service of Japan, and the Divisional Court said that that was to be inferred from the evidence. If the case depended solely upon the contract with the defendants, I would have said that there was no evidence that the captain was in the service of Japan, but that he was in the service of the defendants only. The case does not, however, rest solely upon the written contract. There is more than that. The captain went on board the ship, which then belonged to Japan, and was a war vessel; he at once flew the Japanese flag, and sailed under that flag as far as Aden on the way to Japan. When the ship reached Aden, war had commenced between Japan and China. There is evidence

A as to what happened at Aden, and what the captain said to the crew. He said that the run was at an end, and that he had a private telegram, which must have been from the Japanese government.

I think that there was ample evidence that the captain was a captain of the Japanese government at the time when the voyage was frustrated by the act of the Japanese government. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.

SANDGATE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. KENT COUNTY COUNCIL

F

The obligation to keep up a road includes an obligation to do works and repairs necessary to preserve the road. Thus a sea wall and groynes necessary to prevent a road running along the sea shore from being periodically injured by inroads from the sea, though not forming part of the road, are works of maintenance and repair for which a county council may be chargeable under the Local Government Act, 1888.

G

The words "annual payment towards the costs of maintenance and repair" in s. 11 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888 [see now Highways Act, 1959, s. 237 (1) (a)], held to mean a payment to be made annually in respect of the expenditure of the particular year, not a fixed sum to be arrived at by taking the average expenditure over a series of years.

H

The fact that a footpath along the top of a sea wall is used as a promenade or esplanade for the purposes of pleasure is not inconsistent with its being part of the highway.

Notes. Section 11 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888, has been repealed. Annual payments towards the cost of the maintenance of a road are provided for in s. 237 of the Highways Act, 1959.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.JJ.) reversing a decision of the Divisional Court (CAVE and LAWRENCE, JJ.) upon a Case Stated by an arbitrator appointed by the Local Government Board under s. 11 (4) of the Local Government Act, 1888 [repealed].

The appellants were the highway authority for the district of Sandgate, and in the year 1893 their predecessors, the Local Board of Sandgate, made a large claim against the respondents, the Kent County Council, under s. 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888, in respect of the costs alleged to have been incurred by them during the four years ending Mar. 25, 1893, in the maintenance, and repair, and reasonable improvement of such part of the main road running from Folkestone to Hythe as was within their district. The part of the road referred to was within the urban district of Sandgate, and lay along the sea front and abutted upon the fore-shore. The claim was repudiated by the county council, and the difference was referred to the arbitration of the Local Government Board, and by an order of the Local Government Board under s. 63 of the Local Government Act, 1888, Mr. Thomas Codrington, a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, was appointed to act as arbitrator. The arbitrator published his award in the form of a Special Case on Jan. 1, 1897. By the award, some items of which were in favour of each party, the county council were ordered to pay £6,188 to the urban district council. The Special Case was heard by the Divisional Court on Mar. 19, 1897, and judgment was given on April 6, 1897, confirming the award both as to the amount awarded to the urban district council and as to the residue of the award in favour of the county council, and the court directed that each party should pay their own costs. Both parties appealed, and the appeals were heard together on June 24 and 25, 1897, and judgment was given on June 25, 1897, in favour of the county council on both appeals, directing the arbitrator to reject the whole claim of the urban district council and to award entirely in favour of the county council.

The road in question was a part of a road running from Folkestone to Hythe, and in the year 1883, when it became a main road, there was, between the carriage road and the sea, what was then, and still was known as the "Esplanade." It had been made at various times, and was of various widths. Beyond that there was a piece of land between the esplanade and the carriage road, which was laid out ornamentally and planted with shrubs. As long ago as 1867 the local board had repaired and

A improved it for the purposes of a promenade by regulating the width, kerbing and paving the same throughout. Throughout the entire length it was faced by a sea-wall, the outer edge of the esplanade being on top of the sea-wall. This sea-wall had been erected at different times and under different circumstances, and besides protecting the esplanade and ornamental grounds from the inroads of the sea, it helped to protect parts of the carriage road also.

C THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case, before I deal with the merits of the appeal, I wish to say a word or two upon the subject of the form of the award, because I think that scant justice has been done to the arbitrator in regard to the form in which this Case is stated. I think, with great respect for those who think otherwise, that they have not sufficiently considered the complex nature of the problem which the arbitrator was called upon to solve. At common law all parishes were bound to repair their own roads. But when county councils were established, the duty was cast upon them of maintaining and keeping in repair the main roads in their counties. To that there was added a further provision, that if any local authority thought proper to claim the right of dealing with their own roads they might do so. But the legislature did not, even in such a case, cast the whole cost of the maintenance of their roads on the particular district; the county council is to make a contribution for the purpose. In those circumstances it is obvious that the question of amount is a matter which, unless settled by agreement, can hardly be determined by the ordinary courts of law. The legislature accordingly provided that on failure of the parties to agree on the contribution of the county council it should be determined by the Local Government Board.

D There was a road bordering on the sea, in some places close to the sea, and in some parts further off; in respect of some part of the road it was contended, and found by the arbitrator, that it was part of the main road, and therefore, it was beyond doubt within the jurisdiction of the arbitrator to award the contribution with respect to the maintenance and repair of that part of the main road. Other questions appear to have been raised whether when a thing was not actually part of the main road, but became necessary for the support of the main road, so that the road could not exist as a main road without it, but would be in a continual state of disrepair, the county council could be called upon to repair it, and further it was apparently successfully contended that the main road parted from the sea shore at a point which was not either the main road itself, or connected with, or forming part of the support in maintenance of it, and that if the local authority thought proper to spend money upon it there, they must pay for it themselves. That was the sort of problem that the arbitrator had to solve, and it is manifest from the mere statement of these facts that he had to go into them with great minuteness. [His LORDSHIP discussed the form of the award, and continued.]

E Let me deal with what I may call the merits of the appeal. The first and main question is, of course, whether the road or any part of it, and if so, what part, is part of the main road? Subject to the question of the amount to be allowed, which is a question of fact for the arbitrator, he has found in terms, with respect to a considerable part of it, that it is part of the main road, and therefore, so far as that part of the award is concerned, it is conclusive against the county council, and perfectly according to law. Then there comes another part as to which he finds that it is not part of the main road strictly speaking, but is so necessary to the maintenance of the main road, that unless that construction was there the main road might be washed away. It was argued before the arbitrator that in point of law the expenses, as regards that part, were not recoverable because it was not part of the main road. To my mind that contention is absurd. Is it common sense to say that where the obligation is to maintain the road and keep it in repair, you can, by neglect, allow that duty to be so disregarded that in time the road may be washed away, so that your liability or obligation ceases? Such a proposition is, to my mind, absolutely monstrous. The obligation at common law, and the same obligations have been handed on to the various bodies which in turn have received by statute the obligations and duties in respect of roads, is absolute, that they must keep in repair the roads in their parish. Can anything be more clear than this, that the obligation is absolute in the first instance on the proper body whoever it be? Over and over again it has been decided that where a person is bound ratione tenuræ to repair a main road, and becomes insolvent, the obligation immediately falls upon the parish, and that the parish, or the authority whatever it is, is bound to take upon itself the repair. You cannot, for reasons of public policy which are obvious enough, allow the roads to get out of repair. The obligation has always been held to be absolute and everlasting, and you cannot get rid of it except by statute.

Then the proposition appears to be this, that if you take a main road, not merely the via trita, but that part of it which is said to be dedicated to the public, your jurisdiction must be limited to, and does not go an inch beyond that which is the highway. If that be so, if you want to cut a gutter to prevent the road from being flooded, or to take a culvert under it, where is your culvert to start? Have you no jurisdiction to dig a hole to allow the water to go through the culvert, so as to preserve the road? The truth is that you might put forward half a dozen hypotheses to show that such a construction of the law would reduce the whole thing to an absurdity, and render the administration of the road authority absolutely impossible. I have no hesitation in saying that, assuming a thing to be necessary for the preservation of the road, and assuming that the local authority is under obligation to keep up the road, the law of England is that you shall keep up that road by whatever means are appropriate and necessary to do it. Of course, I do not omit to notice the cases where the road itself has been destroyed, but as BLACKBURN, J., said in R. v. Greenhow (Inhabitants) (1), it is always a question of more or less; it is not because a part of the road is washed away that the road is destroyed. In that case the whole road was for a considerable distance overlaid with earth which had fallen from a hill, but the line of the road was ascertainable, and it was said, and it appears to me obviously good sense, that whenever you are dealing with any general proposition you may bring it so near to the line as to make it an absurdity. In that particular case BLACKBURN, J., thought that the obligation upon the parish was not got rid of, although it would involve considerable work to remove the obstruction, which for the moment had destroyed the passage way along the road.

The question which arose with respect to the groynes appears to be susceptible of the same answer. The arbitrator has found that these groynes are necessary for the maintenance of the road, and, as it appears to me, quite rightly. Then the proposition is this: You cannot do anything of this sort to maintain the road; you must allow it to go out of repair every year, although that would involve extraordinary and unnecessary expense to the parish or local body, whatever it might be; you must do that because your only power is to repair the road. In that argument I think that the word "maintenance" appears to have escaped the attention of those so arguing: the "maintenance" of the road is quite as much a part of the duty as the "repair." Therefore, it appears to me that it follows the same line of thought, and that the award is perfectly good.

As regards the determinations of the arbitrator so far as questions of fact are concerned, we have no power to criticise them. The one question of law which, as it appears to me, is really open upon this award, is the question about the annual contribution. It appears to me to have been sufficiently answered in the course of the discussion here. It is suggested that, though the contribution is not perhaps intended to be a fixed sum, still that you must take it over an average of years. That might or might not have been a very good way to arrive at it. I do not say the contrary, but my answer is, that there is no foundation for it in the statute. The statute reasonably read seems to me to provide that it is to be a reasonable sum

A de anno in annum in each of these cases to be determined each year. I can see good reasons why the legislature should have so enacted, but I am content with saying that, whatever the reasons were, the legislature has so enacted; and it appears to me, therefore, that it is the only rule which can be applied to this case. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that the original judgment of the Queen's Bench Division was right, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to

I cannot help saying further that, if any such question as it was sought to raise here by mixing up the facts that have been found with the law, was open to the court, there would be an end to arbitrations altogether. It has been the policy of our law to treat awards as final and conclusive between the parties. There are
C familiar grounds known to every lawyer upon which an award can be impeached, but the remarkable thing in this case is that no such question is raised, and it seems to me that if your Lordships were to give the least countenance to such a proceeding as this, it would be fatal, not only to the law of arbitration generally, but certainly, having regard to the complex questions which civil engineers have to deal with in these matters, it would render it absolutely hopeless to determine questions of this sort between a local authority and a county council. For these reasons I
D move your Lordships that the judgment of the court below be reversed.

LORD WATSON.—I agree with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that the single question of law raised in the argument in this appeal relates to the accounting between the two parties, raising the question whether the actual sum is to be ascertained annually having regard to the outlay of the urban district council, the E sum expended by the urban district council, or is it to consist of a more or less definite sum which is to be payable from year to year, irrespective, apparently, of the cost to which the urban district council may have been put in that year. Upon the rest of the case I concur generally in all the observations that have been made by the Lord Chancellor, and it is matter of great regret that the courts have been solicited to entertain a great number of questions with which they have nothing
F whatever to do. Those questions are as much barred by the decision of the arbitrator on points of fact as if he had been a separate tribunal of equal jurisdiction with the court itself. It was said that a question of law is involved. There is no such question. There would have been one if the law had been in the condition assumed by the county council, that no part of a high road could ever be used for purposes of recreation. The use of the esplanade for any jus spatiandi or purposes
G of amusement is in no way inconsistent with its being a part of the road. The matter of amount of valuation assessed by the arbitrator is as much within his exclusive jurisdiction as the other questions of fact.

LORD SHAND.—I have also come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal cannot be sustained. On the important question that has been
H argued before us the judgment of that court proceeds on the view that what is called the esplanade was in point of fact a promenade made for a pleasure walk or lounge for the benefit of Sandgate, its inhabitants, and those who are interested in promoting its welfare, and that it was not a path made as part of the public road. The conclusion to which the Court of Appeal came upon that subject is admitted to be sound so far as regards one part of this road, but I think that their judgment
I as to the other part cannot be sustained, because the arbitrator has expressly said that

and again he says,

“the sea wall, whether part of the road or not, was, previous to its destruction by the sea, in extent and circumstance such that its destruction involved the destruction of some part of the road;”

“the erection of this wall was necessary for the protection of the road.”

It appears to me that these findings by the arbitrator upon this matter of fact dispose of the view that this esplanade was a mere pleasure ground and not a path forming part of the road, and therefore that the judgment of the Court of Appeal cannot be affirmed. [HIS LORDSHIP proceeded to criticise the form of the award and Special Case, and expressed an opinion that it should have been remitted to the arbitrator to be re-stated, and continued:] At the same time I am not prepared to say, upon a critical examination of such loose statements by the arbitrator as we have here, that I differ from your Lordships who have preceded me in regard to the motion which has been made.

With regard to the other question, I mean as to the clause of the statute which provides for an annual payment, I agree with the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived. The words of the statute are these :

“The council shall make to such authority an annual payment towards the cost of the maintenance and repair, and reasonable improvement connected with the maintenance and repair of such road.”

There is no suggestion there of that annual payment being estimated upon an average. If the legislature intended that, it has certainly not expressed it, and I agree with your Lordships in thinking that this expression “annual payment” is intended to indicate the moneys that are laid out for that particular year, and not upon an average of years. In conclusion I have only to say that I hope that this case will not be accepted as a precedent for future cases which may come for the decision of the court submitted by arbitrators under the statute.

LORD DAVEY.—I entirely agree with the motion which has been made, and if it were not that we are differing from an unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal, I should not have felt it necessary to add anything to what has been already said, but I will shortly state the reasons why I differ from the conclusions come to by the Court of Appeal.

Two questions seem to have been decided by that court, first, that the footway, which is called the esplanade, was not part of the main road; and, secondly, that there was no liability in the urban district council to construct a sea wall for the protection of the road, and therefore, that they could not charge the expense of that construction against the county council. With regard to the first question, we have the express finding of the arbitrator that

“the footway or esplanade which intervenes between the sea wall and the carriageway was and is part of the road.”

That is a question of fact, and the view of the Court of Appeal, as it seems to me, can only be supported either on the ground that under no circumstances could the footway which is called the esplanade be part of the main road, which appears to me to be quite untenable as a general proposition, or that it appears on the face of the case that there was no evidence upon which the arbitrator could properly find that it was part of the main road. The latter point was the point which was pressed upon the House by the learned counsel for the county council but when we turn to the findings of fact in the Special Case it appears to have no foundation whatever.

With regard to the sea wall I understand the Case to mean that, in the opinion of the arbitrator, it is also part of the road, but whether I am right or not, it is perfectly clear that he considers as a fact that the sea wall was necessary for the protection of the road, and whether it is part of the road, or necessary for the protection of the road, in my opinion the cost of it might equally well be chargeable to the county council. It has no doubt been decided in the courts that where a road has altogether disappeared and is no longer existent, as, for example, where the

A site of the old road has become part of the bed of the sea, or possibly the bed of a river, there is no liability to replace the road, for the reason which has been mentioned, that an essential allegation or averment in an indictment for non-repair of a road is that "there was and is a road from the point A. to B." and there is, therefore, no liability on a road authority to make a new road under those circumstances. And it must also be said that there is no liability upon the road authorities, B which could be enforced either by indictment or otherwise, to do any particular work. Their liability, either at common law or by statute, is general, to repair and maintain the highway, leaving it to them to find out the best, or at any rate adequate, means of discharging that liability.

C But no such question is raised here. The question here is whether the construction of the sea-wall and the groynes, which seem to me to stand in the same position, was a reasonable way of performing the duty imposed by statute on the urban district council of maintaining the road in a proper state of repair. The site of this road is exposed to inroads from the sea, and it appears from the statements in the Special Case that the experience of some years past has shown that the sea, unless it is kept out by adequate works, will break over the road and cut it up, D and render it temporarily impassable, or reduce it to a state in which it requires continuous and constantly recurring repairs. I agree that it would be contrary to common sense to say that it would not be a reasonable and economic mode of keeping the road in repair, and, indeed, one might almost say the only way of maintaining and keeping the road in repair, to construct a work which would protect the road from damage arising from the inroads of the sea. At any rate, it appears to me to E be purely a question of fact. The arbitrator finds that it was necessary for the protection of the road, and we are bound by his statement of facts. On these grounds I feel bound to say that the decision of the Court of Appeal cannot be supported, and that the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division ought to be restored. With regard to the construction of the Act as to the annual payment I have nothing to add to what has already fallen from your Lordships.

F LORD LUDLOW.—I venture to say, with great respect for the court below, that I think that this award, when fairly and fully considered, has been somewhat too severely, and somewhat undeservedly found fault with in the court below. I presume that awards are not to be examined with a homœopathic minuteness, but ought to be read with a willing mind, and I think that if this award is so read, G it is not very difficult to understand what was in the mind of the arbitrator. I consider that this case is entirely concluded by the findings of fact, which cannot be disturbed and cannot be reviewed. I am, therefore, unable to agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and I think that CAVE, J., was perfectly right when he said that the award ought to stand.

I have only one more observation to make, and that is with regard to the words H "annual payment." It was contended before us that "annual payment" had reference to an amount to be arrived at over a series of years. I cannot adopt that view. I think that what was meant was this: A payment to be made annually in respect of the expenditure to be ascertained in the particular year. Probably the idea which the legislators had in their minds was this, that by so enacting any difficulty with regard to the rate that might be made being retrospective would be I avoided. I entirely agree with the motion that has been made.

Re JONES. CHRISTMAS v. JONES

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Kekewich, J.), March 26, April 2, 1897]

[Reported [1897] 2 Ch. 190; 66 L.J.Ch. 439; 76 L.T. 454; 45 W.R. 598]

Executor—Administrator—Costs, charges and expenses—Right to payment out of estate—Liability to be charged with interest on balances paid away.

Administrator—Action by next of kin—Order for costs obtained by administrator—Right to set off sum due for costs against shares due to next-of-kin.

An executor or administrator is entitled to have his costs, charges and expenses out of the estate if they have been incurred without impropriety or fraud or anything which may be termed monstrous. Where he has, without impropriety, paid away balances found by certificate to have been in his hands he will not be ordered to pay interest on such balances. Where an administrator has obtained an order for costs in an action against him brought by the next-of-kin, he is entitled to set off the sum due for costs against the shares due to the next-of-kin.

Summons by the plaintiff in an administration action, that the defendant be ordered to pay interest on £614 7s. 4d., being the balance found due from him; and also the costs of the plaintiff and other parties attending the proceedings; and that a sum of money in court might be distributed as specified in a schedule.

A The action was brought by the plaintiff, Harry William Christmas, against the defendant, David Jones, the administrator of the estate of, and the son of Eleanor Jones, who died intestate, for an account of the share of Eleanor Jones in the estate of her son, James Wright Jones, which had come into the hands of the defendant as administrator. James Wright Jones had acquired an estate in the Transvaal, South Africa, which was supposed to be worth £20,000. The succession to it was regulated by Roman Dutch law, and the defendant took two journeys to South Africa to realise the estate. In an account which the defendant delivered pursuant to an order in the action he claimed to be allowed (item 5) £60 in repayment of advances for the maintenance of Eleanor Jones, and £500 (items 14 to 36) for expenses incurred in the realisation of the estate of James Wright Jones in South Africa. In the account the defendant admitted that he had received £708 9s. 5d. in respect of the estate, and he claimed to be allowed £706 7s. 11d. for expenses.

B In 1891 an action was brought against the defendant as sole executor of his father James Jones, who died in 1880, by John Jones and Mrs. Elizabeth Williams, the brother and sister of the defendant, to revoke the probate of the will of James Jones. This action failed, and, on Mar. 10, 1893, an order was made by the Probate Court that John Jones and Mrs. Williams should pay the defendant the costs of that action—£268 15s. 9d., but this sum had not been paid. By an indenture made Jan. 13, 1893, Mrs. Elizabeth Williams assigned to the plaintiff her interest under the intestacy of her mother, Eleanor Jones. On Jan. 2, 1895, John Jones assigned his share under the intestacy of his mother, Eleanor Jones, to one William Parker. By his certificate in the present action, made May 17, 1895, the chief clerk found that the defendant, as legal personal representative of Eleanor Jones, had received £708 9s. 5d. in respect of her share in the estate of James Wright Jones, and that the defendant was entitled to be allowed £93 11s. 10d., leaving a balance due from him of £614 17s. 7d. Items 5 and 14 to 36 of the account were disallowed. A summons to vary the certificate was taken out by the defendant, and was dismissed with costs. Pursuant to an order made July 12, 1895, the balance—£614 17s. 7d.—found due from the defendant was paid into court, and an inquiry was directed as to what balances had been in his hands as administrator of Eleanor Jones, and during what periods and under what circumstances. By his certificate, made May 21, 1896, the chief clerk found that the defendant, as administrator, had in his hands £602 4s. 6d. from Mar. 31, 1893, to Jan. 31, 1894, and of £614 17s. 7d. from Jan. 31, 1894, to Aug. 15, 1895.

H KEKEWICH, J.—It is quite possible that, if the defendant is allowed all his costs, charges, and expenses, and all his costs as between solicitor and client of this action, this estate, already small, will be made much smaller, and I agree with the plaintiff's counsel that it is not an inaccurate use of language to describe that as "shocking." The estate was supposed to be £20,000, but afterwards it turned out to be about £708, and thus the beneficiaries will in any event get very much less than they anticipated. But what I have to consider is a question of very much greater moment. If I disallow the administrator these costs, to which, according to the rules and practice of the court, he is fairly entitled, that would be far more shocking, because it would not only be against the rule and practice of the court but directly contrary to honesty.

I A man who fulfils the difficult duties of administrator or executor and trustee, is, in common sense and common justice, entitled to be recouped to the very last penny everything that he expends honestly and properly—that is to say, without impropriety—in his character of administrator, executor, and trustee; and the question I have to consider is whether these costs which the administrator here claims have been incurred by him without impropriety in that character. The plaintiff's counsel puts his case well enough, and says this man comes in with a claim against the estate which he is unable to support; that he claims, as an outsider—and that as such he would come in as an ordinary creditor, and as regards these costs he ought to fail, and to pay the costs with which otherwise the estate will be saddled. But, if the costs are not those of an outsider, but are costs incident to the performance of his duty of administrator, then I have only to consider whether he has incurred those costs properly—that is to say, without impropriety. What is the meaning of that? A B

Of course, if an action is brought for the purpose of making the executor or administrator liable for breach of trust, and he is proved to have committed a breach of trust and costs are incurred by resisting the action and in bringing the breach of trust home to the executor, then it is only right that the executor should pay them as part of the penalty for the breach of trust. Again, if an executor brings in any claims strictly in his capacity of executor, which the court can see from the evidence, documentary, or arising out of cross-examination or otherwise, or by a sort of intuitive process, or general view of the case, are not honestly brought forward, then the court, notwithstanding the general rule, may fairly deprive the executor of his costs, and if he is convicted of dishonesty, may order the executor to pay the costs incurred. And again, apart from dishonesty, I say also that the court may visit the executor with costs, or deprive him of his costs, where the claim is of a monstrous character—that is to say, one which no reasonable man could say ought to have been put forward, even although the executor may have believed it, and a solicitor may have prepared the case, and counsel may have argued it. In a case of that kind the court has quite sufficient power to deprive an executor of costs, or even to order him to pay the costs occasioned to the estate. But, subject to those exceptions to the general rule and practice of the court, there is no doubt that the general rule prevails, and that an executor, even though he makes a mistake, and endeavours to charge against an estate items which the law will not allow him to charge, and the endeavour to prove them has failed, and a summons to vary the certificate has been refused with costs, still the executor or administrator is entitled to have his costs out of the estate if incurred without impropriety or fraud or anything which can be termed monstrous. C D E F

To apply those rules to the case in hand: first, as to item 5; the sum of £60 advanced for the maintenance of Eleanor Jones; any man might fairly infer that that was money which should be repaid. There is no impropriety and no monstrosity in that claim. Then as to items 14 to 36 of the account, expenses incurred in South Africa; those expenses were honestly incurred, and there was no impropriety and nothing monstrous on the part of the defendant, though the claim was not sustained. It seems to me that under these circumstances I have no discretion. If I had, I should certainly exercise it by allowing these costs. I think the defendant is entitled to them because he acted honestly. These are expenses which were not incurred in the first instance in his character of administrator; but he has now come here in his character of administrator to sustain his claim, and all I am now considering is whether his reasonable costs of trying to sustain it ought to be allowed. It seems to me, on the principle of several cases which have been cited, and upon the general rule laid down by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Cotterell v. Stratton (1), and the general practice of the court under the general order, that I am bound to do that; and if it is a matter for my discretion, I think I ought to do it, and not a bit the less because I shall very much lessen the money coming to the beneficiaries interested in the estate. I think, therefore, I must allow the defendant all his costs of the action, including his costs, charges, and expenses. It will be necessary, in sending the matter to the taxing master, to explain that the costs, charges, and expenses are not to include item 5 or items 14 to 36 in the account. These items must not be brought in as costs, charges, and expenses. G H I

The other question is equally important in administration actions, and that is whether the executor is to be charged with interest on the balances found by the

A certificate. The order is this: there is an inquiry whether the defendant, as administrator of Eleanor Jones, has had part of the estate in his hands, and if so, for what periods and under what circumstances. The plaintiff's counsel says that, in resisting the claim for interest, the defendant is seeking to vary the chief clerk's certificate. I do not agree with that argument. The inquiry precisely follows form No. 6 in SETON'S JUDGMENTS AND ORDERS (5th Edn.), vol. 2, at p. 983. That is the form of order always directed when the court intends to hold an even hand respecting the liability of an executor for interest on balances such as these. That is shown by the insertion of the words "under what circumstances." It is to be decided hereafter whether the circumstances are such that the court has to fix the executor with interest. In form 7 in SETON'S JUDGMENTS AND ORDERS, interest is charged on the balances in the hands of the defendant under the account of the general personal estate from twelve months after the testator's death, showing that interest after the testator's death should be paid on the money remaining from time to time in the executor's hands. Form No. 8 directs an inquiry whether any and what balances have, since the date of the order, been improperly retained by the plaintiffs, and interest is to be computed on such balances.

D What are the circumstances here? The money was not in the pocket of the administrator; it was not employed in his business; it had not been advanced to anyone, or lent; he had simply paid it away in the manner which he ought not to have done, no doubt, as against the estate, but the payment was not improper in itself. It would be wrong now to say that interest on these balances, on which the administrator has made nothing, should be paid by the defendant. It seems to me that as regards that point the plaintiff fails.

E A further question arose upon the distribution of the fund in court, namely, whether the defendant could set off the debt due to him for costs in the action by John Jones and Mrs. Williams, against their respective shares as next-of-kin in the estate of Eleanor Jones.

F KEKEWICH, J.—If the decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Taylor v. Taylor (1) is sound, it seems to me that it completely covers the dispute, and I am bound by it. It is a decision by a judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction, but it is more than twenty years old, and counsel on neither side have been able to find a case in which this decision has been criticised. That goes a long way towards saying that I am bound to follow it. The argument to the contrary under these circumstances must rest entirely on this—that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., was deciding a case adversely to a series of previous decisions which bound him, and that he inadvertently or otherwise departed from them, and that I am not to follow him. The argument is not tenable. Without laying any stress on the experience and judicial power of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., I observe that there is not the slightest indication in his judgment of an intention to depart from the other cases. He had Whitaker v. Rush (3) cited to him, and also his own decision in Middleton v. Pollock (4), and I observe that nearly all the cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff in the present case were referred to in that case on this subject and recognised. Therefore, I must take him to have come to the conclusion that what he said in Taylor v. Taylor (2) was consistent with those earlier cases. If he did so hold, it is not for me to say that he did not rightly so hold.

I As regards Whitaker v. Rush (3), it is to be observed as an example of many cases which have been referred to as illustrating the principle that one debt cannot be set off against another if they are debts in different rights. That is the marginal note in Whitaker v. Rush (3) to which the judge referred in giving judgment. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., cannot have meant to go against these decisions. What he did mean was, that this was not a case of two debts arising in different rights. There is this slight distinction between Taylor v. Taylor (2) and this case, namely, that there the defendant had lent sums of money to the plaintiff, and counsel for the plaintiff says that shows that he recognised his position. I do not see that there is the slightest difference between an advance out of funds in pocket and liability arising from a judgment of the Court of Probate. Therefore, the question resolves itself into this: whether the two claims arose in different rights or not. Cooper v. Cooper (5) is useful as showing what position the next-of-kin are in as regards the estate. They have a substantial interest in the property: they cannot get it until the account is made out and the debts paid. Starting from the very first moment of the death of the intestate, they have a substantial interest in the property. The administrator is not a trustee for the next-of-kin in the strict sense of the word. But he has a duty to them, subject to all the debts and claims on the estate, namely, to hand over to each of them his aliquot share of the estate. He is in the position of bailiff for them of their share in the estate. When once it is ascertained, their claim against him is a legal claim. Therefore, if they owe him money, he has a right to set off against that the money to which they have a claim. That is what I understand SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said in Taylor v. Taylor (2) (L.R. 20 Eq. at p. 160): "I ask to set off a personal legal debt due from you to me."

As regards the present case, counsel for the plaintiff has not argued one point anticipated by counsel for the defendant, namely, that the money has been paid into court. It could not be argued. The money is paid into court for safe custody, in order that the representative may be himself discharged from liability when the money is claimed. I think it quite right to say that that would no more oust the right of set-off than the right of retainer. The other point is different. Counsel for the plaintiff also represents two of the next-of-kin, who both claim derivatively, being assignees, and the title of one of them passed after the debt became due; as to the other the title was before the judgment, the judgment was of later date. As regards the one, he must claim subject to any right of set-off, if it exists. As to the other, the judgment of later date could not affect the right of the assignee to be paid the share, but he took subject to the rights of the assignor and the administrator.

Under these circumstances I follow the decision in Taylor v. Taylor (2), and there will be an order distributing the estate according to the minutes, except that two sixteenths payable to the plaintiff and two sixteenths payable to William Parker are to be retained by the defendant.

Criminal Law—Vagrancy—Failure to maintain wife—Bona fide belief in her adultery—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), s. 3.

A husband, who was separated from his wife by agreement, refused to maintain her, although able to do so, as he bona fide believed that she had committed adultery. He was, however, willing to contribute towards the maintenance of his children provided they were cared for in the workhouse. The husband was summoned under s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, for wilfully refusing or neglecting to maintain his wife and children, but the justices dismissed the summons.

Held: the decision of the justices was correct.

Notes. That part of s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, relating to persons wilfully refusing to maintain themselves and their families was repealed by the National Assistance Act, 1948, and liability to maintain is now governed by s. 42 of that Act.

Case Stated by the justices for the county of Monmouth.

On Mar. 24, 1897, the appellant, Bathias Clement Morris, a relieving officer of the parish of Abergavenny, preferred a summons against the respondent, Thomas Edmonds, a labourer, charging that he was an idle and disorderly person within s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824.

Elizabeth Edmonds, the wife of the respondent, and the respondent entered into a deed of separation, dated April 27, 1893, whereby the respondent covenanted to pay her the sum of 5s. per week during their joint lives towards the maintenance of herself and her children, of whom she was to have the sole custody, and whom she was to maintain, and she covenanted not at any time thereafter to require the respondent to live with her. The respondent and his wife lived apart in accordance with the deed, and the respondent for some time made the payments due under the deed, but subsequently ceased to make the same. The respondent ceased to make such payments in consequence of a bona fide belief that his wife had committed adultery subsequent to the date of the deed. - Elizabeth Edmonds and her children named in the summons became chargeable to the Abergavenny Union, and the respondent subsequently attended before the guardians of the union, and refused to maintain them, or to contribute towards their maintenance. The respondent denied that he had wilfully refused or neglected to maintain his family within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and he explained that he had ceased to make the payments to her because he alleged that she had committed adultery, and stated that he was willing to pay towards the maintenance of the children provided they were relieved in the workhouse, saying that his wife was not a proper person to have charge of young children, and that he was unable to take charge of them himself, being an indoor servant, but he refused to maintain his wife. The justices decided that this was a case of bona fide mutual separation by deed, that the respondent had at the time of separation made provision for his wife and her children, and had ceased to pay her in consequence of a bona fide belief that she had committed adultery, that the respondent had not within the true meaning and intent of the Vagrancy Act wilfully refused or neglected to maintain his wife and children, and that, therefore, he was not guilty of the offence charged against him by the summons, which they, therefore, dismissed. The question of law arising on the foregoing statement for the opinion of the High Court was, whether the respondent was guilty of wilfully refusing or neglecting to maintain his wife and her children within the true intent and meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 3.

S. T. Evans for the respondent.

HENN COLLINS, J.—I am of opinion that we ought not to interfere with the discretion of the magistrates. They heard and saw the parties, and came to a conclusion that this was bona fide. I was impressed at one time with the distinction of the fact of adultery, and bona fide belief of adultery, but this is a proceeding not to enforce maintenance, but a penal proceeding for an offence, and so we must look and see if the respondent has “wilfully” refused to maintain. The authorities quoted establish that under the circumstances of this case, the man cannot be described as an idle and disorderly person. I think the decision of the magistrates perfectly right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Court of Appeal—New trial—Verdict of jury against weight of evidence—Doubt whether verdict on determination of question for decision.

The verdict of a jury will not be disturbed by the Court of Appeal where the jury have reasonably answered a question of fact properly left to them, but the verdict may be set aside and a new trial ordered where the verdict is one which could not reasonably have been found if the attention of the jury had been directed to the whole of the facts of the case, or where the court is not satisfied that the question which had to be determined was so left to them that their verdict was given on the determination of that question.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., and CHITTY, L.J., LOPES, L.J., dissenting) refusing a new trial in an action tried before LAWRENCE, J., and a jury.

The action was brought by the respondent, a horse dealer in London, against the appellant, a farmer at Bromsgrove, in Worcestershire, to recover £70 for breach of a warranty of a carthorse which the respondent had purchased from the appellant on a warranty that the horse was at the time of the purchase "a good worker." The respondent claimed that on the arrival of the horse by train in London it was immediately found to be a "shiverer," and as such unable to back, and consequently not a good worker. In support of this the respondent called several veterinary surgeons who had examined the animal shortly after its arrival in London and pronounced it to be a very bad shiverer and suffering from a disease which must have been in existence at the time of its purchase by the respondent. The appellant called a number of witnesses who had used the animal continually, and swore that up to the time of the sale the animal was perfectly sound and had shown no symptom of shivering. The jury found for the respondent for the amount claimed. The appellant thereupon applied to the Court of Appeal for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. In the course of his judgment LORD ESHER, M.R., remarked that, short of perverseness on the part of a jury, it was nearly, if not quite, impossible that a new trial could be obtained, on the ground that a verdict was against the weight of evidence when there was conflicting evidence in the case. LOPES, L.J., thought that the Court of Appeal had gone rather too far in refusing new trials in such cases, and that it was clear from the judgment delivered in the House of Lords in Metropolitan Rail.

Co. v. Wright (1) that a new trial ought to be granted if it were necessary to prevent a miscarriage of justice.

Amphlett, Q.C., and E. A. Owen for the appellant.

J. G. Witt, Q.C., and S. W. Clarke for the respondent.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I believe that your Lordships are all agreed that the result of this trial was unsatisfactory. I do not propose to enter into the question of the evidence, because, according to a rule which has been established now for a great numbers of years, when a verdict is being set aside, it is not desirable that the judges who take part in the discussion of the question whether or not there shall be a new trial, should make any observations about what the effect of the evidence was, or what might or might not have been the proper course to pursue; because such observations are likely to prejudice the trial which may come on afterwards; therefore, that matter ought to be left untouched by the tribunal which orders the new trial. For these reasons I do not propose to enter into the question of the exact position which might or might not be assumed by either of the parties when the new trial actually takes place; it is enough for me to say that I think that, taking either of the two views which have been suggested more than once in the course of the argument, either that the jury were wrong in what they did, or that it was not sufficiently apparent what was the question which they had to determine; at all events, the result is unsatisfactory, and the cause must be remitted for another trial.

I have the less hesitation in coming to that conclusion, and so overruling the Court of Appeal, because that court does not appear to me (with great respect to the majority) to have applied its mind to the question which really arose, but they proceeded, apparently, upon some construction which had been placed upon a former decision of your Lordships, introducing, as was said, a new rule in a case of this sort. I am not aware that the Court of Appeal or this House have a right to introduce any new rule on the subject of a new trial; the question has been many times discussed, and certainly, so far as I am concerned, in using the language which I am reported to have used in delivering judgment in the case of Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (1), I was not under the impression that I was suggesting any new rule. I merely gave expression to what I have always believed to be the rule ever since I entered the profession. It is a rule which I see no reason to alter, even if I had jurisdiction to do so, which I have not. I am confident in the belief that I gave utterance to no new rule, or suggested that anything had happened in later times to alter the established rule.

I have been looking into the authorities to see what can have given rise to the impression that it was a new rule, and I find that, in Rafael v. Verelst (2), now more than a century ago, DE GREY, C.J., said in substance very much what I said in Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (1). He says (2 Wm. Bl. at p. 988):

“This verdict is not against the evidence. The court will not set it aside merely because they might have given it the other way.”

If there is a question of fact left to the jury, and they have reasonably answered it, their verdict cannot be disturbed. I am not aware of any observation of my own in Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (1) which would suggest any other rule than that which has certainly been held as established with the authority of that learned judge more than a century ago. I have thought it right to say this because some misapprehension appears to have existed in the mind of LORD ESHER, M.R., that your Lordships in this House had laid down a new rule. He appears to have said that now it is almost impossible to get a new trial; I am not aware of the impossibility, and I am not aware of any authority in this House to lay down any such new rule on the subject.

For these reasons I move your Lordships that this judgment be reversed, and that the respondent pay to the appellant the costs both of the appeal to the Court of

A Appeal and in this House, and that the costs of the former trial and the costs of the new trial should depend upon the result of that trial.

B LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the hesitation of a court to set aside the verdict of a jury is very natural, and that it is expedient that verdicts of juries, when that is the tribunal to determine the question between the parties, should not be set aside, except where one is satisfied that there has been a miscarriage, because a verdict has been found that could not reasonably have been found if the attention of the jury had been directed to the whole of the facts of the case, and to the question in issue which they had to determine. But it seems to me to be a condition of any such rule that the question which had to be determined should have been so left to them that one is satisfied that it was before their minds, that their minds were applied to it, and that they did really on the determination of that question give their verdict. If we think the verdict wrong in this sense, that one would not have given the verdict one's self, still if one sees that the question was properly submitted to the jury, that is not enough ground for granting a new trial. But if one comes to the conclusion that the verdict is not one which one would have given, and is wrong in that sense, I think that one is perfectly justified in saying that there shall be a new trial if one sees that the real question that had to be determined was not so put before the jury as to reasonably satisfy the tribunal that has to determine the question whether there shall be a new trial or not that the mind of the jury was so applied to the question to be determined that they did determine the case upon the answer to that question. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and the judge's summing up and continued:] I cannot myself say in the present case that the jury have found their verdict upon the evidence, and having in view the real question which they had to decide between the parties.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion.

F LORD MORRIS.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived, and I should have been entirely satisfied with merely saying so, but that it appears to me to be really necessary to say a word or two upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case. That court seems to have been under the impression that there had been a new rule of law established by the decision of this House in Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (1) as applicable to the granting of new trials. That mistake may possibly have arisen, in my opinion, from the use by LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in giving judgment in the Court of Appeal in that case, of the expressed that "the verdict was not perverse or unreasonable." He brackets the two terms together as if they were somewhat synonymous. As I observed in the course of the argument, a verdict known as "perverse" is one in which the jury have disobeyed the directions of the judge. In that case it would be called a "perverse verdict," and it would be set aside upon grounds wholly different and dissimilar from those which would lead a court of review to set aside a verdict as being against evidence, or against the weight of evidence. LORD ESHER, M.R., in giving his judgment in the present case, laid down this rather strong doctrine:

I "If you can show that the jury have acted perversely, and have not attended to, or taken any notice of, the evidence, that they have wilfully disregarded what they were about, and would not consider the evidence, then, although there was some evidence, I should say that the verdict was perverse, and I should overrule it. But, short of that, short of showing some disregard of misconduct of the jury, I think that it is nearly impossible, if not quite impossible, for this court now to set aside a verdict."

That appears to me to stretch too far the doctrine applicable to setting aside verdicts as against evidence, or as against the weight of evidence. The use of the word “weight” implies that there is evidence on both sides, but that it preponderates to such an extreme degree on the one side that it would be unreasonable for the jury not to act upon it, although there may be some slight weight in the other scale.

That doctrine of setting aside a verdict as being against evidence, or against the weight of evidence, has lasted in the courts for an immense time. It would be entirely frittered away, in my opinion, if the analogy with a “perverse” verdict, to which I have already called attention, or “wilful misconduct” on the part of the jury, were to be taken as the criterion to apply to it. The criterion to apply to it was stated by the noble and learned Lords who gave judgment in this House, in Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (1), and in my opinion it was also stated by LORD ASHBOURNE in giving judgment in the Privy Council, in Brisbane Municipal Council v. Martin (3), and that is where the tribunal which has to decide the question comes to the conclusion that the jury have, in the verdict at which they have arrived, acted unreasonably upon a contrast of the whole of the evidence on both sides. That has been the definition, and it appears to me that it would be entirely abolished and got rid of if we were to accede to the doctrine that it was necessary to prove that the verdict was either “perverse,” or had arisen from any “wilful misconduct” on the part of the jury, or “from their having shown some disregard of what they were about.” The most honest jury, possibly from dullness, or from a variety of other reasons, may have arrived at a verdict which the tribunal which has to review it might hold to be unreasonable, and that appears to me to come within the rule. I think it would be a very lamentable thing if the doctrine were stretched to the extent laid down by LORD ESHER, M.R., in the present case in giving judgment in the Court of Appeal.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied that there was a miscarriage in the verdict in this case, and that upon a reasonable view of the evidence that verdict ought not to stand. In reference to the general rule, I would only say this, that in my opinion Metropolitan Rail. Co. v. Wright (1) laid down no new rule. Certainly the verdict of a jury ought not to be disturbed upon any light grounds. The court must be satisfied that there has been a miscarriage, and they must be satisfied that the verdict is such that it could not be reasonably sustained on the evidence; but I think that it has been put too strongly by LORD ESHER, M.R., when he represents the state of the law to be this, that “it is nearly impossible to obtain a new trial when a jury have returned their verdict.”

The defendant delivered a defence in which he merely denied or refused to admit the several allegations in the statement of claim and did not set up any substantial defence of his own. On a motion to strike out the defence as frivolous and vexatious, the plaintiff adduced affidavit evidence which showed that in previous proceedings the defendant had admitted on affidavit many of the facts alleged in the statement of claim which he now denied, and that he had not disputed any of the others.

Held: although, generally on an application to strike out a defence, the plaintiff was not entitled to show by affidavit evidence that the statements in the defence were untrue and the court would not strike out a defence because it was false or improbable, the court might receive such evidence strictly to show that the defence was frivolous and vexatious and one which the court under its inherent jurisdiction would strike out as an abuse of process of the court; accordingly, this defence, being an abuse of process of the court, it would be ordered to be struck out.

Notes. This motion to strike out the defence was not brought under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 4 (Current ANNUAL PRACTICE (1963) 573) but invoked the inherent jurisdiction of the court.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of ROMER, J., ordering the defendant's defence to be struck out.

On Feb. 10, 1897, the writ in this action was issued by the plaintiffs, J. E. Remington, W. E. Crisp and J. McRae, against the defendants, J. Scoles and J. Coppen. The statement of claim delivered on Mar. 3, 1897, alleged (i) that in December, 1895, the plaintiffs in conjunction with the defendant Scoles, a solicitor, and M. Ahern, were contemplating the purchase of certain land at Haddenham, in the county of Cambridge, for the purpose of developing it as brick and tile works; (ii) that by an agreement in writing made on Dec. 16, 1895, it was agreed that the plaintiffs should pay as required to the defendant Scoles £2,250, to be applied by him as thereafter mentioned; that he should out of such sum pay £1,250, the agreed price of the land at Haddenham, and complete the purchase in accordance with the agreement for sale then held by him, and on the completion of the purchase should hold the land upon trust for and on behalf of all parties thereto, and should execute such deed of trust as might be required; and the agreement contained further provisions regulating the terms on which the land should be held or disposed of by the defendant Scoles; (iii) that in pursuance of that agreement the plaintiffs paid the defendant Scoles £1,750, out of which he paid for the land at Haddenham, which was conveyed to him by an indenture dated Sept. 3, 1896, in fee simple, but no deed of trust had been executed by him as provided by the agreement; (iv) that in consequence of the parties to that agreement being unable to agree as to the manner in which it should be carried into effect, an action of Remmington v. Scoles was commenced in January, 1897, in the Chancery Division, in which these plaintiffs were plaintiffs and Scoles and M. Ahern were defendants, to have the trusts of the agreement carried into execution by the court; (v) that the defendant Scoles having admitted to the plaintiffs that he had deposited the title deeds relating to the land with J. Coppen as security for advances made to him on his private account, the plaintiffs on Feb. 10, 1897, issued the writ in this action against the defendant and Coppen; (vi) that on the hearing of a motion for an injunction it was proved by Coppen that Scoles had executed a legal mortgage, dated Sept. 24, 1896, of the land to him to secure the sum of £500 and interest, and that on Dec. 9, 1896, Coppen advanced Scoles a further £200 on the security of said land, and that a memorandum of such last-mentioned advance was endorsed on the mortgage of Sept. 29, 1896; and further that Coppen had at the time of making such advances respectively no notice that Scoles was a trustee of the land for the plaintiffs and M. Ahern; that this action was accordingly dismissed against Coppen with costs to be paid in the first instance by the plaintiffs without prejudice to the question how such costs should be ultimately borne; that the plaintiffs were at the date of the issue of the writ in this action wholly unaware that any legal mortgage of the land had been executed; (vii) that by reason of the fraudulent conduct of Scoles the land had become subject to a mortgage debt of £700 and interest, and that Scoles ought to make good to the plaintiffs and M. Ahern the amount of such mortgage debt and interest, and any costs incurred in relation to the same. The plaintiffs claimed (i) a declaration that the defendant was a trustee of the lands at Haddenham for the plaintiffs and M. Ahern; (ii) an injunction to restrain the defendant from dealing with the land except in accordance with the agreement; (iii) that the defendant might be ordered to make good to the plaintiffs and M. Ahern the amount of the mortgage debt of £700 and interest thereon and any costs incurred in relation thereto; (iv) payment by the defendant to the plaintiffs of the costs of Coppen paid by the plaintiffs under the order in this action of Feb. 19, 1897; and (v) damages and costs.

On Mar. 19, 1897, the defendant Scoles delivered his defence, in the first four paragraphs of which: (i) The defendant did not admit that he executed or was a party to any such agreement as set out in para. 2 of the statement of claim or any similar agreement; (ii) The defendant did not admit that the plaintiffs, or any of them, paid the defendant £1,750 or any other sum, or that he out of such moneys or otherwise paid any purchase money or completed any purchase of any land at Haddenham or elsewhere, or that by an indenture of Sept. 3, 1896, or any other indenture, any land at Haddenham or elsewhere was in consideration of £1,250 or any other sum conveyed to the defendant in fee simple, or for any other estate or interest as alleged in para. (iii) of the statement of claim, or in fact; (iii) The defendant did not admit any of the allegations contained in para. (iv) of the statement of claim; (iv) The defendant denied that on Feb. 8, 1897, or on any other date, he admitted to the plaintiffs or any of them, or to any other persons or person (nor did he admit it to be a fact), that he deposited any title deeds relating to any land at Haddenham or elsewhere with J. Coppen, or any other person, as security for advances made to the defendant on his private account or for any other purpose.

A The remaining three paragraphs were of a similar nature merely denying the other allegations contained in the statement of claim. On Mar. 23 the plaintiffs gave the defendant notice of motion to strike out the defence as being frivolous and vexatious and embarrassing, and an abuse of the process of the court. In support of this motion the plaintiff Crisp, in an affidavit, stated that, in the action of Remmington v. Scoles the defendant had, in an affidavit sworn by him on Mar. 10, 1897, admitted the agreement referred to in para. (ii) of the statement of claim, and the payment to him by the plaintiffs of £1,750 as alleged in para. (iii) of the statement of claim; and also that he was in possession of the land in question in this action under the terms of the above-mentioned agreement.

C The plaintiff, Crisp, further stated that a copy of the conveyance to the defendant, referred to in para. (iii) of the statement of claim, was exhibited on the motion for an interlocutory injunction in this action; that, on that motion, a letter written by the defendant expressly admitting that he had completed the purchase for £1,250, was exhibited to the affidavit of J. Coppen.

The facts alleged in paras. (v), (vi) and (vii) of this statement of claim had been proved in the affidavit in support of the plaintiffs and had in no way been denied by the defendant.

D The plaintiff, Crisp, in his affidavit, also stated that, under the circumstances stated, he believed that the defence had been put in solely for the purpose of delaying the plaintiffs in obtaining the relief claimed in this action, and that every allegation in the statement of claim was absolutely true; that the defence was without foundation, and could not be supported, and that he was advised that it was frivolous and vexatious, and an abuse of the process of the court.

E The plaintiffs moved to have the statement of defence struck out.

F ROMER, J.—The court has an inherent power to prevent the abuse of its legal machinery, as was well observed by BOWEN, L.J., in Willis v. Earl Beauchamp (1), where, pointing out that in that case an application to strike out the statement of claim was not made under R.S.C. Ord. 25, r. 4, he says this (11 P.D. at p. 63):

“It does not fall under the rule, but the rules, as we have pointed out more than once, do not, and that a particular rule does not, deprive the court in any way of the inherent power which every court has to prevent the abuse of legal machinery.”

G Undoubtedly in a proper case the court has power to strike out a statement of claim which the court considers is an abuse of the legal machinery of the court. Is that power of the court confined to a statement of claim? It applies to every pleading, and that it applies to a statement of defence is shown by Reichel v. Magrath (2) to which my attention has been called; and it appears to me that in a proper case the court may receive evidence on a motion of this kind for the purpose of showing, but only for the purpose of showing, that any pleading complained of and sought to be struck out is an abuse of the process of the court. If authority were wanted for that proposition it is given by Boswell v. Coaks (3), and I think that the present case is one where the plaintiff was entitled by his evidence to state the circumstances which show that the defence is merely an abuse of the process of the court. I quite agree that a plaintiff is not entitled to try and show by his evidence in general cases what statements in a statement of defence are untrue, so as to raise, as it were, a preliminary trial of the action out of due course. But, as I have said, I think the applicant is entitled, upon a motion of this kind, to bring evidence, confining it strictly to showing that the pleading complained of is an abuse of the process of the court.

In the present case what do I find? The defendant is a solicitor. All the facts in the statement of claim have substantially been already admitted by the defendant in prior proceedings. In my opinion, he clearly has no defence whatever to this action—no substantial defence against it—and none is attempted to be shown by his statement of defence. To my mind it obviously is a case where the defendant wants to delay and hinder the plaintiffs, and for that reason, and for no other, puts in a statement of defence denying or refusing to admit every statement in the statement of claim. The defence here is confined to that. It has no substantial statement of its own; it merely contents itself in substance with denying or refusing to admit every statement in the statement of claim, and that only. It refuses to admit, for example, an agreement in writing stated in para. (ii) of the statement of claim, which I may add has already been admitted under oath in prior proceedings. It refuses to admit even the statement in para. (iv) that an action was brought. In other words, matters stated which obviously give rise to no controversy are here merely denied or refused to be admitted, and, as I have stated, clearly for no other purpose than to hinder and delay the plaintiffs. I think under the circumstances that this defence is not a real defence at all, but, as I have said, is merely an abuse of the process of the court, and I order it to be struck out.

I may say that this decision will in no way, as suggested on behalf of the defendant, render it possible in ordinary cases for a plaintiff to set aside a defence by trying by evidence on motion to show the untruth of the statements in the statement of defence. This is not really a case of the plaintiff trying to show by affidavit that any substantial statements in the statement of defence are untrue, and therefore that the statement of defence ought to be set aside. It is not really a case like that of Hildige v. O'Farrell (4) which has been cited to me and the cases which were cited in that case. As I have pointed out, it is a case where the defendant throughout his statement of defence simply refuses to admit all the statements in the statement of claim as it were en bloc—obviously a statement of defence put in for no honest purpose unless the honest purpose be to defeat and hinder the plaintiffs; but for no real purpose of defence except merely of delaying and hindering the plaintiffs, and because the defendant has no real defence. This case before me I agree is a very exceptional one, and will not be hereafter and cannot be hereafter cited as a precedent for such mischief as was guarded against in Hildige v. O'Farrell (4) and the cases there cited.

I order, under the circumstances in this case, the statement of defence to be struck out, and the defendant to pay the costs of the motion. I will give, as I have already offered to give, the defendant an opportunity of putting in what I have called a real defence, and if he chooses to avail himself of that he will have fourteen days within which to do it. That is on the hypothesis that he may by ingenuity possibly find out some defence which is not at present apparent, and which I am bound to say I do not believe in fact exists.

From this decision the defendant appealed.

G. Lawrence for the plaintiffs.

LINDLEY, L.J.—There is no doubt that what ROMER, J., has done is a very unusual thing to do. It is a very strong thing to say, and it cannot be said as a general proposition, that the defendant is not at liberty to put in a defence denying the statements in the statement of claim. Of course he is entitled to do so, as a general rule; that is obvious. The learned judge is quite right; he recognises the rule which is referred to and illustrated by Hildige v. O'Farrell (4). In a case of that kind the court will not try whether the statement of defence states what is true or false; it will not do anything of the sort. The ground on which the learned judge has proceeded is this, that this is a mere sham. The character of the defence can be seen through, and is stamped by the first three paragraphs, which are mere shams. That gives a character to the whole thing, and bearing in mind what has been done in this very case, I think the learned judge was not wrong when he said as he did, that it is a defence which never ought to have been put in, and that the whole proceeding is with a view to gain time; it is a mere sham defence, it is not an honest defence

A at all. If the defendant has an honest defence, which probably he has not, he is at liberty to put it in. The learned judge has guarded himself. He says it will not do, after what has passed, simply to deny everything. You must deny it if you choose to deny it and give some evidence to show that you are acting honestly. It is a mere trick to gain time. I think the learned judge was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

B
LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge observes in this case that it is an exceptional case, and I think it is an exceptional case. It is a case that can only be dealt with in the way he has dealt with it, and we propose to deal with it, where the circumstances are exceptional. We are entitled to deal with it, and to strike out this defence on account of the inherent jurisdiction in every court of justice to prevent an abuse of its procedure; and I think that this defence, if it was permitted to remain on the file, would be an abuse of the procedure. But I desire to say this, that it is not enough to invoke this kind of jurisdiction of the court if the court thinks the facts alleged in the statement of defence or the statement of claim, as the case may be, improbable or false. But what the learned judge thought here—and I think he was right in so thinking—is that, having regard to the character of this defence, bearing in mind what is known about the case beforehand, what is known about the previous proceedings in the case, he has come to the conclusion—and again I say I think rightly—that it is a sham defence, and that it has been set up, not honestly and bona fide as a substantial defence, but for the purpose of delay. I think, therefore, we ought to support his decision.

RIGBY, L.J.—I do not wish in any way to infringe upon the salutary rule that a defendant has a right to put in issue any fact that he pleases and to have that tried in the regular manner. Therefore this court will not, as O'Donnell v. Reilly (5) and other cases cited have shown, although it may be reasonably satisfied or quite satisfied as far as the affidavit goes that the defence is untrue, strike it out for that reason. But if the court can, on the facts that are not in dispute, ascertain that the actual defence put in is really a defence which has no relation to the merits of the case at all—in other words, that it is a sham defence—then of course the court has jurisdiction, and in this very exceptional case ought to act upon the jurisdiction, and to have that sham defence taken off the file. I think this is a case clearly of that kind, and on that ground the decision of ROMER, J., ought to be upheld.

Solicitor—Costs—Bill—Country solicitor and London agent—Charges of London agent—Inclusion of details in bill—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict., c. 73), s. 37.

A country solicitor employing a London agent ought to incorporate details of the charges of the London agent in his bill of costs since, there being no solicitor and client relationship between the lay client and the London agent, the latter's charges cannot be treated as a disbursement. When a bill of costs is delivered which includes the London agent's charges as a disbursement, there is no complete bill capable of taxation which would justify the solicitor relying on its delivery for twelve months as a ground for non-taxation.

Jan. 19, 1897. STIRLING, J.—This is an application to tax two bills of costs, amounting to £283 11s. 8d., delivered by Messrs. Pomeroy and Tanner, solicitors.

The applicant is the sole surviving executor of the will of Mr. Sampson, who died so far back as 1887. He employed Mr. Pomeroy, who was one of the two solicitors whose name appears in the title to these proceedings, to act as his solicitor with reference to the winding-up of the testator's estate. Mr. Pomeroy's engagement in that capacity continued until November, 1891, when he went into partnership with Mr. Tanner. From that time the applicant must be taken to have retained and employed Messrs. Pomeroy and Tanner as his solicitors. In May, 1894, the executorship affairs were wound-up, whereupon the applicant asked for delivery of the bill of costs. On Jan. 25, 1895, Messrs. Pomeroy and Tanner delivered a bill of costs for £283 11s. 8d., commencing on May 3, 1892. The bill for work done previously to that date, which appeared to have been done by Pomeroy

A alone, was not included. No step with reference to that bill was taken until Feb. 6, 1896, when Messrs. Pomeroy and Tanner began to threaten that they would sue for the balance which appeared due on that bill and on the cash account, which had been delivered at the same time. Thereupon the applicant consulted his solicitor, and that resulted in application being made for delivery of the bill of Mr. Pomeroy alone, and for a cash account from the beginning of the transactions. Accordingly, on April 1, 1896, Mr. Pomeroy delivered certain other bills, which included, amongst others, a bill of the charges of his London agent, with reference to the period covered by the bill which had been delivered on Jan. 25, 1895. Application was made in the common form for taxation of the bill which had been delivered on April 1, 1896, with the exception of that which included the agency charges of the London agent of the country solicitor; but a special application was made with reference to the bill delivered on Jan. 25, 1895, and the London agent's bill. That is the application with which I have now to deal.

D The case was opened to some extent and dealt with and argued on the footing that the bill had been delivered more than twelve months, and that, consequently, it was necessary to make out special circumstances to justify the taxation of the bill; but, in the course of the argument, the question was raised whether the bill which was delivered on Jan. 25, 1895, was a complete bill, so as to justify the solicitors relying on it, inasmuch as the delivery of it took place more than a year ago, as a ground for non-taxation. That depends on the view which is to be taken of the last item in the bill, which is this :

E "Paid agents' charges including disbursements, counsel's fees, court charges. etc., in the dispute and subsequent action against Mrs. Mann and Miss F. A. Sampson and the compromise thereof £54 8s. 9d."

F That, of course, is what I may call a lump item, and is a substantial item amounting to between one-fifth and one-sixth of the whole bill. It is contended that these London agents' charges are merely disbursements, and that it was wrong to include them in the bill of costs at all, and that there was no necessity for delivering a detailed statement of them. On the other hand it was contended that the London agents' charges ought to be included in the bill. The question I have to decide is, which of these contentions is right.

G Let us look at it for a moment as a matter of principle. It is well settled that, as between the client and the London agent of the country solicitor, there is no privity. The relationship of solicitor and client does not exist between the lay client and the London agent. What is done by the London agent is part of the work done by the country solicitor for the client, but, as between the country solicitor and the client, the work is done by the country solicitor. What is done by the London agent is part of the work done by the country solicitor for the client. The country solicitor does, or may do, part of the work personally, or by clerks employed by him in the country, or, if necessary (and the necessity occurred in this case) through his London agents, but, as between the client and the country solicitor, the whole work is done by the country solicitor. It follows, therefore, that such items are not mere disbursements, but are items taxable in the strictest sense between the client and the country solicitor, just as much as if the work had been done by the country solicitor personally, or by the clerks whom he employs in the country. That is the view I take of it according to strict law. It was suggested in the argument that the practice was the other way, and that these items were usually treated as disbursements in bills of costs, and I thought it right to make inquiries of the taxing masters as to what the practice really was. At a meeting of the taxing masters (at which all were present except one), which happened to be held at the close of last week, the matter was considered, and they have informed me that as a matter of practice this item of £54 8s. 8d. was improperly charged as a disbursement, and that the items should appear in detail, and that it was proper and regular to include them in the bill of costs, and that the country solicitor should incorporate them in and on the same bill. A

It appears to me, therefore, that, both in strict law and having regard to the practice, the item cannot be treated as a disbursement, but that the details of such item ought to be included in the bill of costs delivered. Therefore this being a substantial item, the complete bill, on which the country solicitors rely, was not delivered until April, 1896, and, accordingly, I think, an order for taxation must go. B
As regards the costs, it seems to me the proper course would be that the costs of this adjournment into court must be the applicant's in any event, and that the other costs must abide the result of the taxation.

Rule Nisi for a certiorari to quash a conviction of the applicant under s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

The applicant for the rule, Albert Lacey, was summoned at a court of summary jurisdiction, held on Jan. 9, 1897, at Ongar, Essex, on a charge of being found drunk on licensed premises, namely, the Bell Inn, Chipping Ongar, contrary to s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and he was convicted and fined 5s. and costs. The applicant had gone into the Bell Inn on the evening of Sunday, Dec. 20, 1896. He did not leave at closing time, which was ten o'clock, when the other customers left. A police constable, who was on duty near the Bell Inn, suspecting that all the customers had not left the house, gained admittance to the premises at about 10.15 p.m., and in the private bar he found the applicant drunk and leaning across the counter talking to the landlord. On the constable asking why the applicant was there at that time, both the landlord and the applicant stated that the applicant had engaged and paid for a bed at the inn for that night, and that, therefore, he was a lodger. The justices disbelieved the evidence that the applicant had engaged a bed at the inn for that night. They found as facts that the applicant was not a lodger or inmate at or in the Bell Inn, and was not intending to sleep there that night; that when the constable gained admittance during the closing hours the applicant was there and was drunk on the licensed premises. They convicted the applicant of being found drunk on licensed premises, contrary to s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872. A rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the conviction was obtained by the applicant on the ground that "licensed premises" in s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, meant premises which were open to the public and before closing time, and that, as the applicant was found on the premises during closing hours, he was not on "licensed premises" within the meaning of s. 12.

J. C. Earle, for the justices, showed cause.

John Ogle in support of the rule.

HAWKINS, J.—I am of opinion that this rule ought to be discharged. The conviction which is sought to be quashed is a conviction under s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which says that a person who is "found drunk . . . on any licensed premises, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten shillings." [His LORDSHIP continued:] The applicant was found drunk on these licensed premises, and there is no reason to suppose that he did not go there for the purpose of drinking or using these premises as licensed premises; and, unless there was some lawful excuse for his being there, the landlord of the premises would be answerable for his being there in such a condition, and, indeed, for his being there at all; consequently the landlord gave an excuse which was found by the justices to be absolutely untrue. Ten o'clock was the closing hour for this house, and it is said that, if a man is found drunk on the premises ten minutes before ten o'clock, he would have been liable to the penalty under s. 12; but that, if he remained after ten o'clock for the purpose of getting sober or getting more liquor, as the case may be, then, after closing hour, he could not be fined.

In order to support that contention, Lester v. Torrens (1) was quoted. I may say, with regard to the decision in that case, that I absolutely agree with it, as that was a charge brought against the occupier of the licensed premises himself, and the charge had reference to his being found drunk in his own house when the house was absolutely clear to customers, the day's work over, and the house actually closed to the public; the landlord lived on the premises, and it was his private dwelling-house. The court said that the meaning of s. 12 of the Act of 1872 could not be that a man, under such circumstances, would be liable to a penalty under the section, and, in my judgment, it would be very unreasonable to construe the section in any other way. He was a private individual in his own house, doing that which every man may do in his own house. Here, it is perfectly true that the applicant went into this licensed house for the purpose of getting drink, and was found drunk there after closing hours, being neither the landlord, nor a lodger, nor an inmate of the house. He was, to my mind, found drunk on licensed premises, within the meaning of s. 12; and, in my opinion, this construction of the section is fortified by s. 25 [repealed], which imposes a penalty not exceeding 40s. on any person found without lawful excuse on premises during any period during which the premises are required to be closed. According to that section, if, during any period during which the premises are required to be closed, any person is found on them without reasonable excuse, such person is to be liable to a penalty of 40s. If he had been found sober on the premises during closing hours he would, under s. 25, be liable to a penalty of 40s., but if found drunk on the premises during closing hours he would, if the applicant's contention be correct, be liable to no penalty at all. I think that, if a man goes in and uses a licensed house and gets drunk in it, and remains in the house when he has no right to be there—a house, in fact, which he has no excuse at all for entering, except to use it as a licensed house—he is liable to be convicted under s. 12. I think, therefore, that the justices were right, and that this rule ought to be discharged.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Lester v. Torrens (1) does not apply to such a case as this; and, in fact, if it were not for the judgment of MELLOR, J., in that case, there would be no ground at all in support of the applicant's contention here. But even in the judgment of MELLOR, J., there is an expression which is rather in support of this conviction than otherwise, because he says that the house was closed and "everybody excluded but the inmates." The facts here are entirely different, and thinking, as I do, that Lester v. Torrens (1) is rather an authority in support of this conviction, I think that this rule must be discharged.

Re CHAPMAN. COCKS v. CHAPMAN

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lindley, Lopes and Rigby, L.JJ.), July 6, 20, 21, August 7, 1896]

Trust—Investment—Retention of authorised investments—Liability of trustee—Depreciation in value—Error of judgment—Mortgage—Duty to realise within twelve months of testator's death—Realisation not required for testamentary purposes or on ground of prudence.

There is no rule of law that a trustee is liable to make good loss sustained by retaining an authorised security in a falling market, if he retained the security honestly and prudently in the belief that it was the best course to take in the interest of all parties. Trustees acting honestly with ordinary prudence, and within the limits of their trust, are not liable for mere errors of judgment. Wilful default, which includes want of ordinary prudence, must be proved in order to make them liable.

A

Where a will authorises investment on mortgage of real property, there is no duty on executors and trustees to realise mortgages, forming part of the testator's estate at his death, within 12 months of the death, where realisation is not required for any testamentary purpose and where the securities are not so insecure that trustees acting with ordinary prudence ought to realise them.

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., reported [1896] 1 Ch. 323.

By his will, dated July 15, 1871, James Chapman, of Mundford, Norfolk, appointed his daughter, Martha Ann Chapman ("Martha"), Henry Chapman, and James Rollinson his executors and trustees, and gave them his real and personal estate on trust for Martha during her life, with remainder to her children on attaining twenty-one years, the children of any child dying under twenty-one being entitled at the age of twenty-one to the share of the child so dying; in default of such issue the testator, after bequeathing certain legacies, gave the residue of his personal estate equally between his nephews and nieces, the sons and daughters of his two deceased sisters, Mary Green Cocks and Sarah Tyrrell, share and share alike, when and as they should attain twenty-one years, the children of any child dying under twenty-one being entitled at the age of twenty-one to the share of the child so dying. The testator directed his executors to invest such of the trust moneys under his will as were not thereinbefore directed to be invested, on "good real or government security" at interest, with full power at any time to alter and vary any of the investments directed by his will to be made, and to re-invest the trust moneys on like securities without being answerable or accountable for any loss occasioned thereby. He declared that each of his executors should be answerable and accountable only for so much of the trust moneys under his will as he or she should actually receive, and each of them for her and his own separate acts, deeds, and deficiencies and defaults only, and not the one for the other or others of them; and he gave his executors all hereditaments vested in him on any trust or by way of mortgage, to the intent that they might be better enabled to get in, receive, and discharge all the trust estates and moneys secured by way of mortgage. The testator died on July 28, 1880.

At the time of his death the greater part of the testator's residuary personal estate consisted of large sums of money invested in several mortgages of agricultural properties in Norfolk and Suffolk, all the investments having been made by the testator in his lifetime, and at a time when the mortgaged lands were a sufficient security for the sums advanced. The first mortgage was by one Heading for £10,000, and was on a farm in Norfolk of 242 acres, which was bought for £15,504; it was therefore for less than two-thirds. The property was let in 1877 for £550, and was so let when the testator died. Afterwards, in consequence of the fall in the value of property of that character, it was let by the trustees in 1885 for £350, again in 1889 for £267, and later for £151. The lease on which it was let originally expired in 1885, and the mortgagor then was apparently in trouble. His brother, who had a bill of sale over the property, waived it. Nothing substantial could have been obtained at that time, and the trustees retained the security. Foreclosure was suggested rather than taking possession, and an action for arrears of interest was suggested, but no one thought that it would be fruitful. There was a suggestion about selling timber but it was advised against. Some other creditors, Gurney's Bank, realised a security which they had and partly thus and partly by proving against the estate they obtained 10s. in the pound, thus losing half their money. Another mortgagee of some of the property tried to sell his security, but failed. No professional valuer was consulted about what was best to be done with the mortgage.

The next mortgage was considerable. The property mortgaged was bought for £8,500 and mortgaged for £5,500 to the testator by one Boldero. The mortgagor was in possession, and in 1885 he died insolvent; notice was given calling in the money, but it was withdrawn because the money could not be obtained. There was considerable correspondence between the solicitors on both sides and it was obvious that the mortgagor could not pay. A new tenant was found at £160 tithe free. The trustees considered selling the property but decided against it; the evidence showed that it would have been impossible. Again, no professional valuer was consulted.

The next mortgage was for £6,000 and there was no reason to suppose that any loss would be sustained in respect of it; it was on a property of 210 acres which was bought for £8,200, the enfranchisement costing £400, thus raising the purchase money to £8,600. This mortgage was for rather less than two-thirds; the interest was always paid. Then there was a group of four mortgages, Aves's mortgages. Aves had executed a creditor's deed in 1888 when there was £100 due for arrears of interest, and one Robins who was consulted advised that the security was good at the time; the property was valued for proof at £1,390 but a claim was made for depreciation of £294. There was a dispute, and the security was ultimately retained, and there was proof for £100 deficiency. It was not considered worthwhile, by those advising the then trustees, to force a bankruptcy as it would not be fruitful. Again, there was no professional valuer, but Robins, a businessman, thought that the security was good. There were some other mortgages which were unimportant.

The testator regarded Henry Chapman as a man of considerable judgment. An affidavit stated that he had great experience; that he always expected that land would not go on sinking in value, and he was always against an immediate sale. One Banham, an auctioneer and estate agent, stated that both Chapmans, the testator and his brother, were injudicious, and were in the habit of advancing more money than Banham thought advisable. Banham said that the mortgages ought to have been realised many years ago. James Rollinson died on April 5, 1889, and Henry Chapman on June 11, 1891, leaving Martha the sole surviving executor and trustee of the will. John Cocks, the only child of the testator's deceased sister,

A Mary Green Cocks, who was entitled, subject to Martha's life interest, to a reversionary interest in one moiety of the estate, mortgaged it to Sydney Cozens-Hardy, who ultimately in November, 1892, purchased from him one-third part of the moiety.

B On Dec. 21, 1892, Martha and the executors of the will of Henry Chapman received from Sydney Cozens-Hardy a notice stating that the trustees of the will of James Chapman were guilty of a breach of trust in not forthwith after his death investing the trust funds in securities authorised by the will or by the general law and requiring them to invest the funds accordingly. On Mar. 20, 1893, the executors of the will of Henry Chapman took out an originating summons against Martha and Sydney Cozens-Hardy, to ascertain whether the estates of Henry Chapman or Martha, or either of them, ought to make good any deficiencies arising on any of the mortgages and if necessary for administration of the personal estates of James and Henry Chapman. On the hearing of the summons on Aug. 7, 1893, an order was made directing various inquiries as to the mortgage securities. The plaintiffs admitted assets of their testator Henry Chapman. Martha was in possession by her tenants of all the lands comprised in the mortgage securities, except the lands comprised in two mortgages which remained in the occupation of the mortgagors. The chief clerk, by his certificate dated July 3, 1895, certified that the whole of the outstanding mortgage securities had been improperly allowed to remain outstanding, and ought to have been called in within twelve months from the death of James Chapman, but he reserved for the court the question raised by the plaintiffs and Martha whether the trustees, having regard to s. 4 of the Trustee Act, 1893, Amendment Act, 1894, were liable for any breach of trust by reason of their having continued to hold the outstanding mortgage securities as investments authorised by the will.

E On Dec. 17, 1895, KEKEWICH, J., decided that s. 4 of the Act of 1894 had no retrospective operation so as to exempt the trustees from liability for a breach of trust committed before the passing of the Act in retaining an investment and that consequently the plaintiffs, as the executors of Henry Chapman, and the defendant Martha, were liable jointly and severally to make good to the trust estate the deficiency on the mortgage securities.

F The defendant Martha and the plaintiffs appealed and subsequently, by leave of the Court of Appeal, the defendant issued a summons to vary the chief clerk's certificate, and a similar summons was issued by the plaintiffs. At the hearing in the Court of Appeal witnesses were cross-examined.

I Aug. 7, 1896. LINDLEY, L.J., stated the facts substantially as set out above, and continued: We have the whole matter before us, and the question is what ought the decision of the court to be respecting these mortgage securities. It is necessary to observe that the mortgage securities were proper securities under the will of the testator. That is, of course, all important. The mortgage securities were very considerable, and every one of them was created by the testator himself. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts concerning the mortgages, and continued:] The evidence before us satisfies me that more trouble was taken to consider and determine what ought to be done than might be inferred from the affidavits alone. It is true that the trustees did not consult professional surveyors or valuers, but there was nothing special in the nature of the property as there was in Learoyd v. Whiteley (1) to render the assistance of an expert really necessary for the guidance of a prudent man. A man need not be a professional surveyor or valuer to form a trustworthy opinion of the value of ordinary agricultural land; and the law is not so stringent as to compel us to say that the trustees were guilty of a dereliction of duty in not seeking advice from such persons. Henry Chapman, the acting trustee, was himself well acquainted with land and its value, and the testator thought well of him and trusted his judgment. He had no personal interest to serve in not doing the best for the trust estate. When he felt that he wanted further advice he consulted the two Carters, Robins, and one Francis, all men of good judgment and experience. Mr. Francis was a solicitor in Norwich, and he told us what I entirely believe—that for some years after the testator's death Henry Chapman's opinion and the general opinion in Norfolk was, that the fall in value of land would be temporary only; that its value would improve; and that it was unwise for mortgagees to attempt to realise their securities.

These, however, are merely general observations, and it is necessary to examine more closely what the duties of the trustees were at various periods, and to ascertain whether and in what respects there was any failure to discharge those duties. The same persons being executors and trustees, it will be convenient to consider their duties, first, as executors, and, secondly, as trustees, as if the same persons did not fill both characters. Under such a will as this the duty of the executors was simply to call in the testator's unsecured debts and to convert into money so much of his personal estate as was necessary to enable them to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and his debts and pecuniary legacies, and to hand over to the trustees whatever personal estate was not wanted for those purposes. No doubt, speaking generally, it is the duty of executors to get in debts due to their testator. But it was no part of the duty of the executors as such to realise mortgage securities of their testator not wanted for the above-mentioned purposes (see Orr v. Newton (2), which contains some useful observations upon that point), and the executors were not, as executors, guilty of any devastavit in not realising such securities. The duties of the trustees have to be considered first with reference to their acceptance of these mortgages from the executors in the first instance; secondly, with reference to their retention of the mortgages up to the present time.

As regards the acceptance of the mortgages from the executors in the first instance, or, in this case, the retention of the mortgages as part of the trust estate at the end, say, of a year from the death of the testator, it must be borne in mind that investments on mortgage were authorised by the will. The trustees had to consider not whether they should invest money on a particular security, but whether they ought to get rid of a security of a kind upon which they were authorised to invest money. These two considerations are by no means practically the same. Confining myself at present to the end of a year after the testator's death, what the trustees had then to consider was whether they ought to refuse to keep these mortgages as part of the trust estate. Most of the mortgages were for two-thirds of the prices paid for the lands, some were for less. But, as pointed out in Re Medland (3) (41 Ch.D. at p. 481), the retention of such a mortgage is not necessarily a breach of trust.

Having regard to the evidence in this case, I am not prepared to hold that there was any breach of trust in not realising the securities by calling in the mortgage debts, or by proceeding to sell or foreclose in 1881 or 1882. In July, 1881, no one foresaw that the value of land would deteriorate more and more, as we now know that it has, and to have called in Heading's, Boldero's, Francis's, or even Aves's mortgages at that time would have been to do what no competent person would seriously have advised the trustees to do. No witness says that in July, 1881, or shortly afterwards, the testator's mortgage securities were so insecure as that the trustees acting with reasonable prudence ought to have called them in. Banham (who was an auctioneer and valuer, and gave evidence on behalf of Cozens-Hardy) no doubt says that if called in shortly after the testator's death there would have been no loss; but that is quite another matter. The chief clerk has found that these mortgages ought to have been got in or realised in July, 1881. I cannot adopt that view. The evidence is entirely the other way as to all the important mortgages. There may be some doubt about some of the smaller ones. But, as regards those which are of any importance, it would, in my opinion, be wrong to hold that the trustees committed a breach of trust in retaining the testator's mortgages in the first instance as part of his trust estate.

But the mortgages are still unrealised, and it is now unfortunately true that, with one or two exceptions they cannot be realised except at a great loss, and the real question is whether the trustees are liable for this loss. A mortgage security is unlike an ordinary investment, inasmuch as it consists of a debt which can be enforced by action, and also of a security which can be realised by sale or foreclosure. A trustee of a mortgage security is, therefore, liable for loss sustained by his wilful default in not obtaining payment in either of these ways. But a trustee is not a surety, nor is he an insurer; he is only liable for some wrong done by himself, and loss of trust money is not per se proof of such wrong. We have to deal here with authorised trust investments, and this must never be lost sight of. Everything turns upon it. Bearing this point in mind, and bearing also in mind that we have to deal with honest trustees placed in great difficulties by the constant fall in the value of land, what is it that they have done wrong?

First, it is said that they ought long ago to have called upon the mortgagors for payment. But so long as the land was a satisfactory security the trustees committed no breach of duty in not calling in the money; and when the land ceased to be a satisfactory security the mortgagors were themselves in such difficulties that nothing could be got from them. Moreover, the mortgagors for the large sums were farmers and could not have paid off or materially reduced the mortgage debts and have kept on their farms. To have pressed them would have been to throw the farms on the hands of the trustees, and this certainly would not have been for the benefit of the trust estate. What could the trustees have done? They might have given up their securities and have proved for their debts; or they might have sold or valued their securities and proved for the difference; or they might have held aloof and retained their securities. The trustees adopted the last course, not hastily nor without consideration and advice, but after advice. Mr. Francis now says it was, in his opinion, the best course they could have taken. No one says the contrary, for Banham refers to a time when the mortgagors were still solvent. I cannot say that the trustees were guilty of such imprudence as to render them liable for the consequences of adopting the course they did.

Then it is said that the trustees ought to have realised the securities; but how? Foreclosure would have cost money and would have benefited no one. The trustees have the mortgaged lands now and nothing has been lost by not foreclosing. On the other hand, the expenses of foreclosing have been saved to the trust estate. The only other mode of realising would have been by sale. But not a single person is called to say that it would have been a prudent or judicious step to try and sell. On the other hand, there is evidence that it would not, and it is clear that, unless the mortgaged property had been sold whilst the securities were good, sales, even if effected at all, would have resulted in serious loss. There is no rule of law which compels the court to hold that an honest trustee is liable to make good loss sustained by retaining an authorised security in a falling market, if he did so honestly and prudently in the belief that it was the best course to take in the interest of all parties. Trustees acting honestly with ordinary prudence and within the limits of their trust are not liable for mere errors of judgment. Any loss sustained by the trust estate under such circumstances falls upon and must be borne by the owners of the property—i.e., the cestuis que trust—and cannot be thrown by them on their trustees, who have done no wrong, though the result may prove that they possibly might have done better. Learoyd v. Whiteley (1) is a clear authority to this effect; so are Buxton v. Buxton (4) and Marsden v. Kent (5). The case is an important one not only to the trustees of this particular will, but to trustees of mortgages generally. Owing to the great fall in the value of agricultural land, trustees of mortgage securities have been placed in a position of great difficulty. To throw on the trustees the loss sustained by the fall in value of securities authorised by the trust, wilful default, which includes want of ordinary prudence on the part of the trustees, must be proved; but it is not proved in this case. In my opinion wilful default is disproved in all the important instances, and is not proved in the doubtful ones. The appeal must be allowed.

[His LORDSHIP ordered that there should be one order on both summonses and both appeals, striking out from the certificate the finding that the mortgage securities were improperly retained; and varying the order of the court below by striking out the declaration of liability and the consequential directions and substituting a declaration that the trustees of James Chapman's will were not liable. No order as to the costs of the summonses and appeals.]

LOPES, L.J.—In this case it is sought to throw upon trustees under the will of James Chapman, trustees who are also his executors, a loss in the value of certain mortgage securities occasioned by the depreciation in the value of land. The case is a most important one, and, having regard to the gradual and persistent depression of the agricultural industry in this country, most intimately concerns the position of a large body of persons who have incurred the responsibility of trustees. The testator, James Chapman, died in July, 1880. The securities in question were authorised by the trust, and were all created during the life of the testator (a man who had largely invested in real securities, and had acquired much experience as to their desirability) and were at the time of their creation respectively of sufficient value to justify the mortgage debts secured by them. The facts of the case, so far as necessary, have been fully stated. I propose to deal with the case only so far as concerns the liability of the trustees.

In 1879 the depression in the value of land, caused by the importation into this country of foreign produce, began first to be sensibly felt; a series of bad seasons followed, the season of 1879 being probably the worst of all. This depression, though it has fluctuated at times, has gradually continued. Expectation, however, of improved times has never, in the minds of those most competent to judge, become extinct. I unhesitatingly say that it would have been considered unwise until quite recently, when each succeeding year had rendered the future less hopeful, to have realised real securities, such as mortgages, when that realisation would of necessity have been attended with a heavy loss. It is very easy to be wise after the event; but, in order to exercise a fair judgment with regard to the conduct of trustees at a particular time, one must place oneself in the position they occupied at that time, and determine for oneself what, having regard to the opinion prevalent at that time, would have been considered the prudent course for them to have adopted. As I have said, the trustees and executors were the same persons, and it was faintly urged that they, as executors, ought to have realised these real securities at the end of a year after the testator's death. That is easily disposed of. It cannot be seriously contended that it was the duty of the executors to realise mortgages created by the testator himself when their realisation was not required for any testamentary purpose, and when the securities themselves were not in any peril.

I will now state what I believe to be the law applicable to trustees circumstanced like the trustees in the present case. A trustee who is honest and reasonably competent is not to be held responsible for a mere error in judgment when the question which he has to consider is whether a security of a class authorised, but depreciated in value, should be retained or realised, provided he acts with reasonable care, prudence, and circumspection. The liability of trustees should not, in my judgment, be extended. What was said by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Speight, Speight v. Gaunt (6) is very applicable to this case. He says (22 Ch.D. at p. 746) :

“I think it is the duty of the court in these cases, where there is a question of nicety as to construction or otherwise, to lean to the side of the honest trustee and not to be anxious to find fine and extraordinary reasons to fix him with any liability upon the contract. You are to endeavour, as far as possible, having regard to the whole transaction, to avoid making an honest man, who is not paid for the performance of an unthankful office, liable for the failure of other people

A from whom he receives no benefit. I think that is the view which has been taken by modern judges, and some of the older cases in which a different view has been taken would now be repudiated with indignation. It appears to me that the Vice-Chancellor has adopted an entirely different view. I think he has inferred that which is not fairly to be inferred in this case; and even if he were right it could only be inferred by taking one of two views, and we ought not to take the
B adverse view if the other view being equally as good can be adopted."

Re Medland (3) and Learoyd v. Whiteley (1) are also important cases on this subject. Adopting my formula, have the trustees in this case sinned against it?

In 1881 they take the mortgages from the executors, and most certainly would not have been justified in realising them—mortgages created by the testator, authorised by the trust, and at that time in no possible jeopardy. But they retained them.
C What was the state of things in 1881? No one could anticipate what was about to happen; it was not a question of value, it was a question of the prospects of the landed interest. Those prospects depended on an infinite variety of circumstances, the happening and effect of which no one but a prophet could foresee. The trustees admittedly were honest; admittedly they were competent. It is said they ought to have consulted valuers. I do not believe any valuer could have given any advice
D which would have assisted them. Valuers could have ascertained the then value of the land, but with regard to the prospects of land, or of its ultimate recovery, absolute or partial, they were powerless to express an opinion. I doubt much whether the opinion of a practical farmer, cultivating his own land, was not preferable to that of any ordinary expert. Henry Chapman was a practical farmer and well acquainted with land, and able, therefore, to form an opinion as to future
E prospects. Mr. Francis said, in answer to me in the witness-box, that the preponderance of opinion in the county was in favour of retaining mortgage securities rather than of realising them; and no evidence was adduced to rebut that statement.

But it is said the largest mortgagors were unable to pay the interest due on the mortgages, and that then the trustees ought to have adopted means to realise the debts. This, no doubt, is the strongest point made against the trustees, and
F involves considerations which require careful examination. The trustees might have brought an action on the covenants; they might have exercised the powers of sale contained in the mortgage deeds; or they might have foreclosed. And if any of these remedies could be shown to have been imprudently neglected by the trustees, and thereby loss to the trust estate caused, they would be liable for wilful default. But the answer is, that it would not have been wise as things
G then stood to have pressed any of these remedies. So long as the land afforded a sufficient security it would clearly have been unwise to precipitate events which there was reasonable ground for believing never would have happened. And even in the case of the smaller mortgages it would be difficult to say that, having regard to the general opinion then prevalent, it was unwise to wait for better times, when
H it was clear that taking proceedings would in all probability have placed the land in the hands of the trustees for them to cultivate without any available capital, and would have eventuated in a sale at a ruinously low price.

When it was apprehended that the securities were insufficient, the trustees were placed in a most difficult position. I do not believe anything substantial would have been obtained from the mortgagors if actions had been brought on the
I covenants; and if those mortgagors who were farming the lands, the subject-matter of the mortgages, had been pressed, the probability is that they would have been compelled to give up their farms, or at any rate, for want of capital, to cultivate them in such a way as to make them unremunerative; and in this case the farms would have been thrown on the hands of the trustees, who would have had to find new tenants or to have cultivated the lands themselves, and have found capital for so doing. The same answer may be made to the suggestion that the trustees ought to have foreclosed. Clearly this would not have been desirable, nor do I think giving up their securities and proving for their debts, or selling or valuing their securities and proving for the difference, would have benefited the trust estate. The only other course was to retain the mortgages as they have done. I am unable to say this was unwise or amounts to a breach of trust, having regard to the very peculiar circumstances in which the trustees were placed, bearing in mind that the securities were authorised securities, and that nobody could with any degree of certainty anticipate the contingencies to which land was subject or form any reliable opinion as to its future. There is evidence, and I believe it, to show that the better-received opinion was that it was advisable to retain mortgage securities like these in hopes of better times. I cannot find that the trustees committed in these circumstances any breach of trust or made wilful default, I think the appeal should be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree that this appeal ought to be allowed, and I agree in the form of order that has been proposed by LINDLEY, L.J. [HIS LORDSHIP expressed regret that the question had been dealt with on an originating summons by proceedings in chambers, and continued:] I am bound to say that at the very first sight of the chief clerk's certificate I had a very strong impression that it must be wrong; because we find all the numerous mortgages dealt with in one paragraph, which treats it apparently as a matter of law that the securities ought to have been called in within twelve months after the testator's death, and fixing the responsibility of the trustees as from that date. Certainly there is no such rule of law; and when we look at the schedule to the certificate we find that these mortgages differ in their circumstances pretty nearly as much as mortgages could differ one from the other. It seemed to me next to an impossibility that that finding in the chief clerk's certificate could in point of law be correct. However, we could not proceed without having some evidence before us. The court, therefore, decided, in the very special circumstances of the case, that, notwithstanding the irregularity, or by reason of the irregularity, of the earlier proceedings—for which, as I have said, Cozens-Hardy was not responsible—and notwithstanding the time that had expired, justice required that liberty should be given to issue a summons to vary the certificate, the effect being of course to let in the evidence which had been read before the chief clerk. And at Mr. Warmington's very reasonable suggestion he was allowed to cross-examine in court Miss Chapman herself, and Mr. Francis, the solicitor who had had a good deal to do with these matters.

I think that the misconception in this case has arisen altogether from confounding two totally different questions: the one, what is the duty of trustees who have money in their possession for investment; the other, what is the duty of trustees with respect to investments for which they are not primarily liable, and which in the exercise of their discretion they have chosen not to call in? The two things, I repeat, are totally different. In the one case you have the money safe and capable of being invested in securities which would incur no risk at all; I mean no risk that the court can anticipate, and no liability on the part of the trustees. And it is not important to add that, for any investigation into the value of the property, for any fees payable to experts, trustees can (and do as a matter of fact) throw those expenses upon the intended mortgagor. Therefore, a proper investigation can be made without throwing any expense upon the estate. If in these circumstances trustees choose to disregard the well-known general rules of the court—including the rule which is the most material for the present purpose, that they are not to invest in agricultural land to an amount exceeding two-thirds of its value—they are incurring a risk with their eyes open, and which is altogether the consequence of their own acts. The case is entirely different when you have to deal with existing securities. So far as I know, the court has never laid down that, even with regard to risky securities, such as Turkish bonds for instance or shares in an unlimited company, there is an absolute unvarying obligation on executors or trustees to get them in within the twelve months regardless of the opinion the trustees may have as to the prudence or the advisability of doing so. Of the cases

A cited by LINDLEY, L.J., I may mention Burton v. Buxton (4), and Marsden v. Kent (5), which show that there is no such rule, and that the court has never been so unreasonable as to say to a trustee: "There is a fixed and binding rule; you have not acted upon it as you thought for the benefit of the estate; things have turned out unfortunately and you must pay the loss."

B There being no such rule, what is the duty of trustees who get possession of an estate where there are mortgage securities? Of course, if on the face of things they appear to be good mortgage securities, certainly there is no obligation on them to call in those securities. It would be very idle to do so for the purpose of investing in other securities perhaps not more advantageous to the estate. At any rate the rule, as I have already remarked, does not exist. What have they to do? They are to act honestly. Here there is no kind of doubt but that the trustees C acted honestly. One of them, Miss Chapman, was tenant for life of the testator's property. Her interest as well as that of the other persons who were residuary legatees was to have the property safe. Trustees must act prudently as a prudent man acting prudently would do with regard to his own affairs.

D Let us consider the state of things as to these mortgages. The principal mortgages are Heading's mortgage for altogether £10,000 and Boldero's for £5,500; and for other reasons I shall have to consider Aves's mortgages—four of them altogether. I do not remember that any case was made out as to any other of the mortgages. They were thrown in as a make-weight, but certainly no such case has been made out by the evidence brought to our attention as would induce us with respect to those to make an adverse order on the trustees. Take the Heading mortgage, the £10,000 mortgage. It is shown that when the testator advanced the money E upon that mortgage he did it within the two-thirds limit. There may be some question, I dare say, whether that two-thirds limit was not slightly exceeded at the end of twelve months after his death. But under what circumstances had that deficiency, if there were one, arisen? In this country as in others, real property had been going up in value by leaps and bounds. In England, indeed, it had been increasing in value for some uncertain period; Mr. Francis fixes the high-water F mark at between 1871 and 1874. The value had gone up for so long a period, as we all know, that it had come to be considered as part of the law of nature that real property must in our state of society and of civilisation continue to advance.

G Then came what upon the evidence seems to have been taken as a period of temporary depression. The year 1879, a twelvemonth before the testator's death, was one of the worst seasons that had been known, which, of course, would have a temporary effect upon the value of property. No one, as I judge from the evidence—and I have no doubt that that evidence is in accordance with what we all know to be the fact, but I go on the evidence alone—supposed that there was to be a further deterioration in the value of property. Everyone in this country apparently thought that by waiting a little the old order of things would return and that property would come back to its former value, or rather that it might be reasonably H expected to go far beyond, according to experience at that time. As regards these mortgages, at any rate, nothing was done.

I Taking the £10,000 mortgage, the property was then let to a tenant at £550 a year; a rent in itself which was a good deal more than sufficient to pay the interest on the mortgage. Did the trustees act otherwise than as a man acting prudently in his own affairs would have acted in taking no steps respecting that mortgage? I cannot say that they did not. I think that they did act as almost every prudent man would have acted at that time. It is suggested, and, of course, has to be considered, that they ought then to have got a valuer to put a value on the property, and to have called on Heading to reduce the capital amount due on the mortgage to such a point that it would not then exceed two-thirds of the real value. I think that that is a rule far too strict to impose for the first time on trustees, and I find no authority for saying that that is their duty. To value land is an expensive matter. It is a certain loss, to provide against a quite uncertain danger, which prudent men at the time thought would take care of itself by reason of the anticipated recovery in the value of land.

So matters went on until 1885, and before 1885 Heading, the mortgagor, appears to have fallen somewhat in arrear with his interest notwithstanding that he was receiving the rent of £550 a year. He was pressed, as we know now, with his own affairs, and he fell in some arrear as to the interest. Who was Heading? He was a farmer, not occupying this farm, but occupying another important farm, as I gather, in the same part of the county. The trustees had no reason to suppose that he was anything but an honest man, and if he could not keep down the interest, what was the chance of their succeeding in getting him to pay off any part of the capital? What would have been the probable result of pressing him? I think that the probable, if not the certain, result would have been that his difficulties would have increased; he would have been obliged to become bankrupt, and the trustees would have had the danger of having to value their security under circumstances of very great difficulty. Of course, if they had valued it too high, it would have been left on their hands. If they had valued it too low, it would not have repaid them the amount of their investment, and they would have lost their security. I think that there is a reasonable ground for supposing that any personal proceedings against Heading would have resulted in a loss, or, at any rate, would have appeared at the time (and that is the real point) as most likely to result in a loss, rather than a benefit to the estate.

As I understand the authorities, they have never gone so far as to lay down that you must prove absolutely that proceedings taken under such circumstances would not have resulted in bringing back the money belonging to the estate, but that you must show that there was such reasonable ground for thinking that they would not; and that a prudent man acting prudently would not have taken the course which was taken by these trustees. As regards that mortgage, I really do not think that there is any ground whatsoever for saying that there was a breach of trust down to the time of Heading's difficulties in 1885. From that time we know unfortunately that the position of things had changed so much to the disadvantage of the estate that the securities were altogether insufficient to pay off the debts. Mr. Francis says, speaking generally about these matters, that real property was selling so badly that everyone would have thought it absurd to offer it for sale. I do not see why we should not take that evidence as good evidence. He is not an expert in the value of land, but he is a man thoroughly conversant with landed property in that part of the country from his position as a solicitor; and that evidence is evidence of great value in favour of the trustees.

I will not go through the other cases with the same amount of detail. As regards Boldero's mortgage there no doubt was a 5 per cent. security instead of a 4 per cent. That points a little to the security not being of the full value, but rather more to the fact that the mortgagor was not in a position to go into the market and give the best security possible. He was in occupation of the mortgaged farm, and the trustees had to consider whether they would take the strong step of proceeding against him personally with the result that he probably—I do not say certainly, and it is not necessary to prove certainty—would have had to give up the occupation of the farm. We have to consider whether a prudent man acting prudently would have done that in his own case. I do not think that he would. I think that he would have said: "I had better let Boldero have the advantage of the good time which is likely to come; I had better allow him to remain there, and not turn him out of the estate with the strong probability that I shall get no other tenant, and that I shall be obliged either to sell the property on disastrous terms without a tenant, or to undertake the cultivation myself." I do not, I repeat, think that a prudent man would have done that.

With regard to Aves's mortgage, I think that the evidence shows that the subject was very carefully considered by Henry Chapman. Miss Chapman no doubt trusted a great deal to Henry Chapman, and she might unfortunately have been made

A liable if he had done anything that was altogether wrong. But he seems then to have gone into the matter very carefully indeed, and to have come to the conclusion, on what I must say were, to my mind, reasonable grounds, that it was far better not to run the risk of having the property taken away at such valuation as was the only reasonable one to make then, but to hold on to it. I cannot see that in any other case there was anything done that was not according to the lights
B and according to the knowledge of the time, or done in a way that was imprudent, unduly speculative, or in any other way reprehensible on the part of the trustees.

I do not mention all the authorities that have been already cited, because there is not any advantage in repeating. But, with regard to one case which has not been mentioned by my learned brethren, namely Ames v. Parkinson (7), decided by a great authority, LORD LANGDALE, counsel for Sydney Cozens-Hardy asked us to
C come to the conclusion that there was a duty to call in mortgage debts corresponding, and in fact co-extensive with, the duty which trustees are under when they invest money on mortgage. I do not read that case so at all. The question there was between a specific legatee of a legacy of £1,500 and the residuary legatees, one of whom was the very trustee who was sought to be made liable. The question only referred to a small sum of £200. It is not the less an authority for that reason,
D but what was the state of things? The evidence was that it was not a sufficient security; and that therefore, as between the specific legatee and the residuary legatees, it was not a proper sum to retain. The trust there was to invest on mortgage securities or government securities—one somewhat risky you may say, and the other perfectly safe. The trustees were carrying out their trust to invest in that case by appropriation, and under the circumstances there, what LORD
E LANGDALE said was, that they were bound to get in those securities in order to invest. Still there was positively a trust to invest on mortgage securities, which they were supposed to be carrying out. I do not think that that is a case at all like the present, where the investment has taken place without any responsibility on the part of the trustees, and where the only question is what under difficult circumstances the trustees ought to have done. I repeat, that I quite agree in F the order which LINDLEY, L.J., has proposed.

Copyright—Infringement—Stock Exchange prices—Publication to subscribers—Prices obtained and published by non-subscriber.

By a contract made by the plaintiffs with the committee of the London Stock Exchange information as to prices on the Stock Exchange was collected from hour to hour by a member and transmitted by telegraph to the plaintiffs who communicated it to their subscribers by tape machines, the subscribers being under contract not to supply the information to non-subscribers. The information was also typed by the plaintiffs on a sheet which was registered as a newspaper and sold to the public. The defendant, who was not a subscriber, induced a subscriber, in breach of his contract, to supply him with the prices telegraphed by the plaintiffs, and wrote the prices so obtained on a blackboard in his office for the use of his customers.

Held: (i) since the plaintiffs' newspaper was published before the defendant published the prices on his blackboard he had infringed their copyright in the newspaper; (ii) even if the publication of the newspaper were subsequent to the publication by the defendant of the prices on his blackboard, he had invaded the plaintiffs' common law right of property in the unpublished figures; and (ii) damage must necessarily have resulted to the plaintiffs from the act of the defendant in inducing the subscriber to break his contract and special damage need not be proved; and the plaintiffs were entitled to injunctions accordingly.

Appeal from a decision of MATHEW, J., in favour of the plaintiffs at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in 73 L.T. 120.

The plaintiffs, the Exchange Telegraph Co., were a company, part of whose business was to collect information as to prices and quotations on the London Stock Exchange, and to telegraph that information to their subscribers, members of the Stock Exchange and others who were not members, on the terms that the subscribers would not supply the information to non-subscribers, and would only use it for their own purposes. They entered into a contract with the committee of the Stock Exchange, by which, in consideration of a royalty, they obtained permission to appoint a member of the Stock Exchange to obtain for them, from time to time during each day, information as to the prices and fluctuations in stocks and shares. The prices so obtained were telegraphed from the Stock Exchange to the plaintiffs about six times each day, the prices being marked upon a slip or tape that came out of the receiving instrument. One of the plaintiffs' clerks at once telegraphed the information so received to their subscribers by means of a tape machine, and another clerk at the same time recorded by a type-writing machine the same information upon sheets which were made up into a newspaper entitled "The Exchange Telegraph Company's Stock Exchange News" and registered at Stationers' Hall, copies of which were sold to anyone who wished to buy them.

F The defendant, who carried on business as an outside broker under the name of Gregory & Co., was at one time one of the plaintiffs' subscribers, but subsequently the Stock Exchange Committee objected to the information being given to certain outside brokers, the defendant among them, and in March, 1894, the plaintiffs refused to supply the information to him when he ceased to be a subscriber. The defendant thereupon went to one of the plaintiffs' subscribers, and obtained from him the information that he had received from the plaintiffs, and used that information for the purposes of his, the defendant's, business by transcribing the prices so obtained on to a blackboard in his office.

H The plaintiffs brought an action claiming injunctions restraining the defendant from infringing their copyright in the information published in the newspaper, from obtaining information from their tapes and thereby invading their proprietary rights in unpublished matters and from inducing their subscribers to give the information to him in breach of their contracts with the plaintiffs. MATHEW, J., granted the injunctions and the defendant appealed.

I Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Macaskie (Cock, Q.C.), with them) for the defendant.
Bigham, Q.C., and Montague Shearman (Scrutton with them) for the plaintiffs.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—In this case a mean and contemptible act has been committed by the defendant, and in any doubtful act of his I shall draw the inference of fact against him, knowing from experience that a man who has done one mean act for the purpose of gain would do another mean act if it were wanted for the same purpose. What then has occurred in this case? Transactions take place upon the Stock Exchange which are altering every minute in the day. It is a valuable thing for people to know what transactions are taking place on the Stock Exchange, and at what prices, and the instantaneous communication of those facts is of great value. The Stock Exchange belongs to certain persons, and it is managed by a committee, who have a right to deal with it as they think fit. The persons whom they choose to admit there are bound to submit to the terms imposed as a condition of their admittance. It is, as I have said, a valuable thing for members of the Stock Exchange to know the course of dealing in the various stocks throughout the day, and the committee may take measures to collect that information and supply it to the members. They may also give the information to others besides members. They gave that information to the plaintiffs, who paid for it.

But the committee say that they will not give that information to outside brokers, who transact outside the Stock Exchange and outside the control and rules of the Stock Exchange, business of a similar character to that which is transacted on the Stock Exchange. This they have a perfect right to do. They give this information to the members of the Stock Exchange on condition that they make use of it for the purpose of their own transactions, and will not communicate it to anyone else to use it for profit. The committee allow the plaintiffs to have this information for the purpose of distributing it among their subscribers, and the defendant knows that the plaintiffs, under the conditions upon which they receive it, will not take him as a subscriber. He knows the terms that the plaintiffs have made with their subscribers, namely, that the subscribers shall not impart the information to non-subscribers. The defendant wants the information in order to induce people to deal with him in stocks and shares. Knowing all that, for the purpose of obtaining that information he goes surreptitiously to some person who is a subscriber, and persuades that person to give him the information from time to time during the day. In fact he pays somebody to break his contract and to commit a gross breach of faith. I have no hesitation in calling that a mean act. That information was the property of the Stock Exchange, and they sold it to the plaintiffs, and the defendant has wilfully invaded that right of property which the plaintiffs so purchased.

It has been argued that damage must be shown to support the cause of action for inducing the subscriber to give the information to the defendant in breach of his contract with the plaintiffs, and that no damage has been proved here. In my opinion what the defendant has done must cause some damage to the plaintiffs. I can imagine many ways in which it would injure them. The plaintiffs sell this information from hour to hour, and if a person cannot get it in the surreptitious mode in which the defendant got it, he must buy the plaintiffs' newspaper which contains it. To my mind that is sufficient. It is not necessary to measure the damages exactly. The tribunal which has to assess the damages may say that the defendant has caused the plaintiffs damage by a mean and contemptible act, in order to benefit himself—that, in fact, damage must ensue from his act—and the damages are at large. It is not necessary to prove any specific damage. In the same way, in cases of trespass to land, the damages are at large, and the jury has to assess them. Next, as to the infringement of the statutory copyright: a great deal of the argument which has been addressed to us is not supported by the facts. To my mind the proper inference of fact is, that the defendant put upon his black-board the information which was already published in the plaintiffs' newspaper. The defendant, therefore, infringed the plaintiffs' copyright. He has done so in the past, and has threatened to do so in the future, and accordingly MATHEW, J., was right in granting the injunction, and every part of that injunction is right. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The injunction has been granted in three particulars. The first restrains the defendant from multiplying copies of and thereby

A infringing the plaintiffs' copyright in their newspaper. It then goes on to restrain the defendant from obtaining information from the plaintiffs' tapes. Thirdly, it restrains the defendant from inducing the plaintiffs' subscribers to give the information which the plaintiffs had obtained by special arrangement with the Stock Exchange. In my opinion all these heads of injunction are justified by the facts of the case. The facts have been fully stated by the Master of the Rolls. The B Stock Exchange supplied to the plaintiffs, by leave of the committee, certain valuable information, for which the plaintiffs paid, on condition that the information should not be communicated to the present defendant among others. The plaintiffs were at liberty to communicate the information to their own subscribers. They also published it in their newspaper, and communicated it to the evening newspapers. C They communicated it to their subscribers on the condition that it was to be used for their special information only, and was not to be communicated to non-subscribers for reward or otherwise.

It is material to observe that the defendant was himself at one time a subscriber and bound by this condition. Therefore he knew of this condition. The Stock Exchange refused to allow the information to be communicated to him, and there- D upon he committed this fraud: he went to a subscriber and induced that subscriber to break his contract and to communicate the information to him. He then wrote the information so obtained on a blackboard in his office for the purpose of his business. This information is absolutely essential to his business. He must have it from hour to hour, and the only mode in which he could obtain it was by fraudulently inducing a subscriber to give it to him, or by buying the plaintiffs' E newspaper. MATHEW, J., has first of all restrained the defendant from taking the information from the plaintiffs' newspaper. The evidence shows that, simultaneously with the communication of the information to the subscribers, the plaintiffs print six times each day this newspaper, which is registered under the Act, and in which they have a statutory copyright. It, therefore, seems to me to be a necessary inference that there must be many occasions on which the defendant F put this information on his blackboard after the newspaper was printed. That would be a distinct infringement of the statutory copyright. But MATHEW, J., thought that there might be instances of the publication of the information on the blackboard before the paper was printed, and to restrain this invasion of the plaintiffs' proprietary rights he has granted the injunction in both forms.

There remains the third head upon which the injunction was granted. It is said G that, as there is no contractual relation between the plaintiffs and the defendant, damage must be shown. I agree that the gist of this cause of action is damage. But, if the facts are such that damage must in the ordinary course result, that is sufficient. It is not necessary to prove special damage. If the defendant did not get this information fraudulently, he must have bought the newspaper. There was thus a loss of one customer at any rate. The act of the defendant in obtaining this H information in a surreptitious manner is a direct interference with the plaintiffs' business. It is obvious that, if this can be done by one, it can be done by a dozen, and the result would be that one subscriber would be sufficient, and everyone else could take the information from him. It seems to me clear that damage must ensue, and therefore the third head of the injunction is perfectly warranted by the facts.

I RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The action is founded on three main causes of action. The first is founded upon an attack made upon the proprietary right of persons in unpublished matter. The second is founded upon an attack made upon the proprietary right of persons in published matter. The third is not founded upon any proprietary right, but consists of an attack on the interest which the plaintiffs have in a contract. As regards the first, it is not necessary to prove registration or damage actually sustained. As regards the second, it is necessary to prove registration, but not damage. As regards the third, unless damage has been actually sustained, there is no right of action at all. That is the only thing which brings the plaintiffs into any relation with the defendant. There is no contract between them. My view of the contract with the subscribers is, that it was a term of the contract that the subscribers should use their instruments solely for the purpose of personal information. The defendant, well knowing that term, for the purpose of injuring the plaintiffs and benefiting himself, induced a subscriber to supply the information in question to him. In the statement of claim there is no allegation of damage, but that becomes immaterial because the defendant set up in his defence that there was no damage, and upon that the plaintiffs joined issue, so that the question of damage has been put in issue.

First of all, was there here a proprietary right in this unpublished matter? The facts are, that the matter is produced in the first instance by means of a telegraphic instrument on a tape, which is the property of the persons who have collected the information. Simultaneously with the creation of this sheet of letterpress a copy is made by a typewriter for the purpose of the newspaper, which is entitled to protection by copyright. This printed matter is literature within the meaning of the authorities, and before publication it is the property of the plaintiffs, and after publication it gives them a right to a monopoly of the multiplication of copies of it. We find that, simultaneously with the placing of the information on the defendant's blackboard, or so nearly simultaneously that it would be difficult to say whether it was before or after—I should come to the conclusion that sometimes the copy was sent off before and sometimes after—the publication of it in the plaintiffs' newspaper took place. That would justify the injunction in the form granted by the learned judge, including both the common law right of property and the statutory copyright. I cannot see how we can say that, because this was intended to be communicated to a large section of the public, that would deprive the plaintiffs of their common law right of property. They can limit the publication of the information as they think fit, and they have contracted with their subscribers that the latter shall not communicate the information to others.

With regard to the question of damages arising under the third cause of action, it is not the procuring of a breach of every contract that will give a right of action, even if done maliciously. We must in each case consider the nature of the contract. I have come to the conclusion that damage has been sufficiently proved. I cannot doubt, considering the importance of outside brokers getting this information, that they must get it from the plaintiffs if they cannot get it in the way this defendant has got it, and that the plaintiffs have suffered damage in their business by the act of the defendant. I do not stop to inquire the amount of the damage. Any damage will be sufficient to give a right of action. As the defendant threatens to continue doing as he has done, the injunction must go.

ELLESMERE BREWERY CO. v. COOPER AND OTHERS

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Cave, J.),

Guarantee—Co-sureties—Contribution—Sureties bound for different amounts—Claim for less than full amount for which sureties liable—Contribution by each surety in proportion to his liability.

A principal and four others as sureties for him entered into a bond whereby they were jointly and severally bound to the plaintiffs in the sum of £150 in case the principal, who was an employee of the plaintiffs, should fail to account for all moneys received by him for the plaintiffs. By the terms of the bond, the liability of N., one of the sureties, and that of another surety, was limited to £50 each, while the liability of the other two sureties was limited to £25 each. N., who was the last to sign the bond, added after his signature the words "£25 only." The principal having failed to account to the plaintiffs for the sum of £48 received for them, the plaintiffs sued him and the four sureties on the bond to recover this sum.

Held: (i) the principle of contribution inter se between sureties who were jointly and severally bound in unequal amounts was that where the claim was for less than the full amount for which the sureties were liable, each must contribute to the loss in proportion to the amount of his liability on the bond; (ii) the addition of the words by N. reducing the amount of his liability was a material alteration which rendered the bond void against all the defendants (except the principal) including N. himself.

Per CURIAM: The principle upon which liability of sureties inter se rests is that sureties for the same principal, and for the same engagement, even though bound by different instruments and for different amounts, have a common interest and a common burden, so that if one surety who is directly liable to the creditor pays such creditor, he can claim contribution from his co-sureties whose obligations he has discharged, and it is clear that one surety cannot keep for his own sole benefit a security for his suretyship where he is bound with other sureties for the same principal and the same engagement.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the county court judge sitting at Oswestry by which he gave judgment for the plaintiffs as against the defendant Cooper, the principal, but in favour of the other four defendants, the sureties.

The facts, as stated by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., were as follows : This was an action against Cooper and four other defendants who had signed a bond as sureties for Cooper. At the trial before the learned county court judge, judgment was given for the plaintiffs as against Cooper, and judgment given for the four remaining defendants—the sureties.

The facts were, that Cooper, having become agent and traveller for the plaintiffs, was called upon to give them some security. He accordingly gave the bond in question, in which he was joined by the four other defendants. The bond was dated April 30, 1894. By its terms the five defendants were jointly and severally bound to the plaintiffs in the sum of £150. It then recited that Cooper had been appointed agent for the company, and stated the condition of the bond to be that, if Cooper duly accounted for all moneys received by him for the plaintiffs and otherwise performed the duties of his agency, the bond should be void. It then provided that the liability of Nunnerly and Emberton (two of the defendants) should be limited to £50, and that of Pay and Bromfield (two other of the defendants) to £25 each.

The effect, therefore, of the bond as drawn was, that the principal and the sureties were jointly and severally bound in the sum of £150, but that liability could not be enforced against any of the sureties beyond the limit of the sum specified as to each of them. Nunnerly was the last to sign, and his signature thus appears on the bond—"Walter Nunnerly. Twenty-five pounds only." The witness to the execution of each of the signatures was Mr. Bruce, the plaintiffs' manager, who, so far as appeared, took the bond without making any objection to the manner of Nunnerly's execution; nor was it suggested that Nunnerly had surreptitiously added the qualification of "twenty-five pounds only" to his signature. As no evidence was given on the point it could not be assumed that Nunnerly in bad faith sought, by the form of his execution of the bond, to limit any liability he had previously agreed to undertake. The probability was that, in giving particulars of his sureties, Cooper had erroneously stated that Nunnerly had agreed to undertake liability to the extent of £50, whereas he had done so only to the extent of £25. Subsequently Cooper, the principal, received moneys for the plaintiffs to the amount of £48 for which he had failed to account, and judgment was given against him at the trial for that amount.

The contested question was the liability of the other defendants—the sureties.

A The learned county court judge held that no one of them was liable, and gave judgment for them accordingly. The present appeal was against that judgment.

B

Dec. 5, 1895. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., read the following judgment of the court in which after stating the facts as set out above, he continued:—It was argued for the plaintiffs—(i) that the form of Nunnerly's execution did not constitute an alteration of the bond so as to discharge from liability the three prior executing sureties; (ii) that, if an alteration, it was not a material alteration, and therefore did not discharge such sureties; and lastly (iii) that in any case Nunnerly was liable to the extent of £50, or if not of £50 at least to the extent of £25. In my judgment no one of these contentions is well founded. I think the effect of Nunnerly's mode of execution on the facts of this case is substantially the same as if the proviso in the body of the bond had been altered by him before execution by him by striking out £50 and inserting instead £25. It was, therefore, an alteration; its effect I shall presently discuss.

The argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs was, that the loss in question was to be divided into fourths, and that so long as each fourth did not exceed the sum for which each surety had become liable, each of them was bound to pay and without any right to contribution from his co-sureties, whether the fixed limit of his liability was for the greater or the smaller amount. Here it was said the one-fourth of the loss was £12, and as Nunnerly had clearly intended to make himself liable, as also had Pay and Bromfield, for £25 each, it was immaterial whether Nunnerly signed for £25 or for £50. Each, it was contended, was bound to pay £12, and Emberton was bound to bear no more of the loss than the others. In my judgment this contention is founded on a misapprehension of the law. It renders it necessary to consider the principle upon which liability of sureties inter se rests. That principle is, that sureties for the same principal, and for the same engagement, even though bound by different instruments, and for different amounts, have a common interest and a common burden, so that, if one surety who is directly liable to the creditor pays such creditor, he can claim contribution from his co-sureties whose obligations to the creditor he has discharged.

H

How is the amount of the claim to be determined? According to the argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs it is to be determined by the number of the sureties. Thus, if there are four sureties and one of them pays all, he can recover one-fourth, and one-fourth only, of his payment from each of the other three co-sureties. This is not in all cases true, even where each of the sureties has made himself liable for the same amount. Thus, where four sureties are jointly and severally bound in a surety bond, and one of them pays the amount of the bond, but one of the remaining three sureties is insolvent, the right to contribution against the two other sureties is for thirds, not for fourths of the sum paid.

I

How, when, although the sureties are jointly and severally bound, there are different limits of liability, as in this case? It is clear that, where the full amount of the bond is due and payable to the creditor, that liability can only be enforced against each surety to the limit of the liability fixed in the instrument. In such case there would be no right of contribution, for each had paid to the limit of his liability. But, suppose only half the amount of the bond is due and payable to the creditor, and such amount is paid by one only of the sureties who has fixed the limit of his liability at one-half the amount of the bond, could it be said that he had no right to any contribution from his co-sureties? Surely not. The burden is a common burden of all, but unequally distributed. By his payment of the loss of one-half the surety has discharged a liability which might have been enforced against the other sureties upon the fixed limit. It would be against all equitable principles that in such a case the other sureties should go free because it happened that the creditor had enforced payment against one only.

Again, it is clear that one surety cannot keep for his own sole benefit a security for his suretyship where he is bound with other sureties for the same principal and the same engagement. Suppose, then, that one surety, whose limit of liability was £1,000, had realised £1,000 from such a security, being bound with three other sureties with a limit of liability of £2,000 each, making in all £7,000; it is clear that that £1,000 must be taken into account for the benefit of all the sureties inter se. But upon what principle? Surely, upon the only principle which will secure its equitable division—namely proportional distribution. Thus the surety for £1,000 would benefit to the extent of one-seventh, and each of the others to the extent of two-sevenths each. The same principle must apply where the burden has to be distributed. Where the claim of the creditor is to the full amount, each must pay up to the fixed limit of his liability; but when the claim is less than such full amount, and it is discharged by one, the claim must be proportionately borne by the others, even where the claim does not exceed the fixed limit of the surety who has paid.

What I have so far said is, I think, to be gathered from the principles laid down in Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea (1); but in Pendlebury v. Walker (2), ALDERSON, B., expressly states the rule thus (4 Y. & C. at p. 441):

“Where the same default of the principal renders all the co-sureties responsible, all are to contribute, and then the law superadds that which is not only the principle but the equitable mode of applying the principle that they should all contribute equally if each is a surety to an equal amount, and if not equally, then proportionately to the amount for which each is a surety.”

In Steel v. Dixon (3), FRY, J., cited with approval the language I have quoted; and, later PEARSON, J., in Re Arcedekne, adopts the language of FRY, J.: see also Ellis v. Emmanuel (5) and Evans v. Bremridge (6).

Apply this principle to the present case. I assume the bond to have been executed according to its original tenor without qualification or alteration. The total loss being £48, Emberton having subscribed for £50 out of the total of £150, would be liable for one-third; and if he paid no more would have no claim for contribution; if he paid to the plaintiff more than one-third, he could claim contribution from his co-sureties in the proportion of their subscription. Stated as a sum in proportion Emberton's liability would be arrived at thus: As 150 is to 50, so is 48 to the result. So worked out Emberton would be liable for £16 only, and if he paid more would have a claim for contribution. In like manner Pay and Bromfield would be liable for £8 each, and Nunnerly for £16.

To appreciate the materiality of the alteration, let us consider its effect upon the liability of Nunnerly. He explicitly says, “I execute the bond only on the terms of my liability being limited to £25.” He could not, therefore, in any case be made liable for more (whether he can be made liable even for the £25, I shall presently consider). What, then, is the effect of the altered limitation to £25 by Nunnerly upon the position of the other three sureties? Take Emberton's position. For simplicity assume that the total liability to the plaintiff company for £48 had been paid by Emberton. According to the tenor of the bond without the alteration Emberton would have to bear two-sixths, equal to one-third of the loss; Nunnerly, I two-sixths, equal to one-third; and Pay and Bromfield, one-sixth each. But by the alteration it is manifest that Emberton, who has paid, would not have the same right of contribution against Nunnerly; and if Nunnerly is not bound at all would have no right of contribution against him. The alteration then was clearly material. It is unnecessary to give similar illustrations as to Pay and Bromfield.

The result, therefore, is that neither Emberton, Pay, nor Bromfield can be made liable on this bond. Each of them is entitled to say, “The contract into which I entered was on the basis of Nunnerly being a party to it with a liability of £50.

That is not the contract as it now appears from the bond, and I am therefore not bound by it." Their position would be still stronger if Nunnerly is not bound by the bond at all.

The remaining question then is, is Nunnerly bound at all? I have already intimated that as he has expressly said, "I shall be liable only for £25." He cannot be made liable for £50; but, is he liable even for the £25? I think he is not. He, in good faith, as must be assumed, expressly limits his liability to £25, but he undertakes that liability, not as a separate or independent liability, but as part of a contract, in which three other sureties are joining him, against whom in certain eventualities he will have rights of recourse, between whom and himself a common burden is to be borne, although unequally distributed. But if, in fact, such other sureties are not bound by the contract—and I have adjudged that they are not—Nunnerly is entitled to say, "That is not the contract into which I have entered, and I am not bound by it." The judgment of the learned county court judge must stand, and the appeal will, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of CHARLES, J., at the trial of the action without a jury, reported [1897] 1 Q.B. 401.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the defendant for wrongful dismissal or, alternatively, for damages for breach of warranty of authority. He alleged that in 1892 the defendant, Her Majesty's Commissioner and Consul-General for the Oil Rivers Protectorate (now known as the Niger Protectorate) in Africa, had engaged him to serve in the Protectorate for a term of three years certain, and had wrongfully dismissed him before the end of the three years. The plaintiff had sought compensation from the Crown by a petition of right, which was dismissed upon the ground that servants of the Crown hold their offices only during the pleasure of the Crown: Dunn v. R., ante p. 907. The action came on before CHARLES, J., the plaintiff alleging (i) an absolute contract of service between him and the defendant whereby he was to be retained in service until Jan. 29, 1895, at the earliest, and (ii) breach of a warranty of authority by the defendant that he was duly authorised by the Crown to engage the plaintiff, the plaintiff being thereby induced to accept his engagement. CHARLES, J., found against the plaintiff on the first point, holding himself bound by the decision in Dunn v. R. (ante p. 907) in which the plaintiff had taken up the position that he was the servant, not of the defendant, but of the Crown. On the second point the learned judge held that the doctrine of an implied warranty of authority was inapplicable to a public servant and therefore the defendant had no personal liability or responsibility towards the plaintiff. The plaintiff appealed.

W. H. Stevenson for the plaintiff.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Robert Finlay, Q.C.) and H. Sutton, for the defendant, were not called upon to argue.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I quite agree with CHARLES, J., upon the ground upon which he himself has put his judgment; but it seems to me that he need not have put it on that ground, and that it is as clear a case as possible otherwise. It is suggested that the defendant, Sir Claude Macdonald, employed the plaintiff for three years, and that he had no authority to do so, and that he warranted that he had authority. The truth is that he had authority to appoint him for three years, and he did it. If he appointed him at all, he had authority; but of course subject to this, that, although in the name of the Crown he appoints him for three years, the Crown can dismiss him at any moment. Therefore, the alleged warranty comes to this, not that he had no authority to employ the plaintiff, but that it must be inferred that he promised him that he should be kept in the employ for three years certain, whereas he had no authority to make such a promise as that. But CHARLES, J., says: I will assume for the purposes of my judgment that the defendant did employ him for three years certain; but the only way in which he employed him was in the capacity of Governor of that district—Governor appointed by the Crown—and he appointed this plaintiff to serve under the Crown because he, the defendant, was the Governor appointed by the Crown, and, in his capacity of Governor appointed by the Crown, he made this contract with the plaintiff. Assuming all that, the plaintiff says that he will bring an action in respect of that contract, so made with him, against the defendant and alleges an implied stipulation that he had authority to employ him. CHARLES, J., held that, supposing the plaintiff could say that truly, nevertheless he cannot make the defendant personally liable because the defendant made this contract by virtue of himself being a public servant of the Crown, and no action lies against a public servant of the Crown, upon any contract which he makes in that capacity, unless he has made an expressly personal contract. It cannot be pretended here that he made any express contract that he had authority to do anything. It is said to be the implied authority, and in respect of that there are decisions of the highest courts a hundred years old that he cannot be made liable for any such contract, and therefore the learned judge so holds. Therefore there is no bottom whatever in the grounds on which this appeal is brought, and it must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—If there was not another and insuperable objection to this case, I am at a loss to see myself that any breach is made out, because it appears that the defendant had authority to make the appointment which he did make. I think the case would fail on that ground; but there is a much more cogent ground than

A that. The liabilities of public agents on contract stand on a very different footing from contracts made by ordinary agents. In the ordinary course of things, unless there is something very special which would be evidence that the person intended to be personally liable, an agent contracting on behalf of the government or a republic is not personally bound by such contract, even though he would, by the terms of the contract, be bound if it was an agency of a private nature. That is the law which is established by a number of cases for any number of years past. In the present case the defendant was beyond all question a public servant, and it was in his capacity of a public servant that he appointed the plaintiff to his place. I think there is that very short answer to the case, and that, I understand, is the answer given by CHARLES, J., at greater length. I entirely agree with him.

C CHITTY, L.J.—An agent for the Crown is not personally liable on any contract entered into by him on behalf of the Crown. That immunity is well established. But, if we were to accept the proposition of the plaintiff, the immunity would be practically abolished, because the plaintiff contends that the Crown agent is personally liable upon a contract warranting his agency. It cannot be doubted that a Crown agent may enter into an express contract of that kind, and on that contract, if it was so expressed, he would be personally liable. But the argument of the plaintiff here is that there is an implied contract. It is plain that the defendant was acting in this transaction simply in one character and one character only, namely as agent for the Crown with the power of appointment that has already been mentioned. To draw an inference in this case, whereby a contract will appear as by implication from that circumstance and from that circumstance alone, that he was intending personally to bind himself with reference to the warranty of the agency, seems to me to be utterly inconsistent with the facts and the main proposition. There is no ground, therefore, for inferring that he was voluntarily entering into an implied contract warranting some authority in his private capacity.

Appeal against a decision of NORTH, J., on a motion by the plaintiffs in the action, William Seaward and others, to commit one Edwin Murray for contempt of court.

The plaintiffs were William Seaward, the lessee for a term of ninety years of premises known as No. 53, Fetter Lane, in the city of London, an under-lessee of part of the premises, and a mortgagee of such underlease. The defendant William Paterson was the under-lessee of the first, second, and third floors of the premises from Seaward for a term of twenty-one years from Christmas, 1895, under a lease dated Dec. 13, 1895, which contained a covenant in the words of the injunction hereafter mentioned. The object of the action was to restrain the defendant from holding upon the premises boxing contests which had been advertised under the name of meetings of the Queensbury Sports Club, Ltd., a company registered for the purpose. The action was heard on July 15, 1896, and a perpetual injunction was granted in the following terms :

“That the defendant George Paterson, his under-tenants, agents, and servants, be perpetually restrained from doing or suffering to be done anything which may interfere with the full and quiet enjoyment by the plaintiff William Seaward or his under-tenants of the premises adjoining or neighbouring to the first, second, and third floors of the messuage or tenement No. 53, Fetter Lane, in the city of London, demised by the plaintiff William Seaward to the defendant by indenture of lease dated Dec. 13, 1895, or which shall be or tend to grow to be an annoyance, nuisance, damage, inconvenience, disturbance, or injury to the plaintiff William Seaward or his superior landlord, or his or their tenants or any of them, and from using the said premises so demised to the defendant as aforesaid, or suffering the same to be used otherwise than for the purpose of a private club, without the written licence of the plaintiff William Seaward.”

On Oct. 9 and 21 boxing entertainments were again given on the defendant's premises, which the court held to be a clear breach of the injunction. On Nov. 11, 1896, the plaintiffs moved to commit Paterson and Sheppard, a prize-fighter, who, it was alleged, had acted as his servant and agent in the matter. Paterson swore an affidavit that he had never, since the date of the order, had any control over the premises; that Edwin Murray took possession of the premises in December, 1895, and had put into possession the Queensberry Sports Club, Ltd.; that he had taken the house at Murray's request, under a promise that Murray would indemnify him; that all profits of the club were to belong to Murray; and that the action had been defended in Paterson's name by Murray's solicitors, on his instructions, and with funds found by him. The plaintiffs then amended the notice of motion by asking to commit Murray as well as the others. The motion stood over for cross-examination of witnesses, and now came on for hearing. NORTH, J., found the following facts were proved. Murray, who had been present in court at the hearing, but left before judgment, was fully informed of the injunction as soon as it was granted, though he was not actually served with the order until after Oct. 21. Paterson was a man of no means, and all the money required for costs of the lease, rent, and for fitting up the premises for the purposes of the Queensberry Sports Club was found by Murray, and the money paid by members of the club was paid to Murray's partner. Murray was present at the boxing contests on Oct. 9 and 21, not merely as a spectator but as a person interested in the premises, and in the proceeds of the performance. In giving judgment the learned judge said: In my opinion, any person who deliberately assists another person in committing a breach of an injunction can be punished for contempt of court in taking part in the commission of such acts. As regards servants and agents, I think that there is an explanation of those words often being used in such a case. I think they are inserted as a warning to other persons. The words servants and agents are, I think, used, not as describing a particular class of persons, but as describing any persons who act as servants or agents, or assistants of the person who is restrained in committing the act the commission of which is restrained, and I do not think there is any magic in those words. If the act restrained was one which could only be committed through a solicitor, for instance, I think it would be quite right expressly to restrain a man, his solicitors and agents, from committing it. . . . It seems to me, therefore, that in this case Murray, whether Paterson has servants or agents or not, is in the same position as they are if he has assisted Paterson in committing a breach of the injunction. In my opinion, that clearly is the case here. I have referred to the early history of Murray's connection with the matter not for the purpose of making his contempt worse by reason of this connection, but as throwing light upon the circumstances under which he was present on the occasions in question. Under these circumstances I think that all the three persons named in the motion have rendered themselves liable to committal. As regards Sheppard, I think that he is a servant, and that I may deal more lightly with his case than the others. But I think that, as to all three persons, it is a case in which I can usefully say for what period they shall be imprisoned. They must be committed for contempt of court, and a direction will be given by the order that Sheppard shall be discharged after being in prison a fortnight, and the other two after being in prison a month.

Murray appealed.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case is really one of importance. The courts ought to be very chary about committing people for contempt, or still more for fanciful contempt, with which the court must necessarily, unless it is to become useless, deal in the interests of the public. The greater the power the more caution it is necessary to use in exercising it.

The case which we have got before us is one which I do not think is anywhere near the line. It seems a plain straightforward case. On July 15, 1896, NORTH, J., granted an injunction in an action against a man named Paterson, to restrain him from infringing a covenant in a lease which had been granted to him by the plaintiff. The controversy at that time turned upon the fact that Paterson had got a boxing club, or something of the kind, on the first, second, and third floors of a house in Fetter Lane, the premises which had been demised to him, and that was complained of by other people, and was an infringement of the covenant contained in the lease. NORTH, J., having come to that conclusion, granted an injunction restraining Paterson, his under-tenants, agents, and servants, from doing or suffering to be done anything which might interfere with the full and quiet enjoyment by the plaintiff or his under-tenants of the premises adjoining or neighbouring to the first, second, and third floors of the messuage or tenement demised by the plaintiff to the defendant, or which should be or tend to grow to be an annoyance, nuisance, damage, inconvenience, disturbance, or injury to the plaintiff or his superior landlord, or his or their tenants, or from using the premises, or suffering the same to be used otherwise than for the purpose of a private club, without the written licence of the plaintiff. The injunction, as is usual in such cases, follows the language of the covenant in the lease granted to the defendant, but the real nuisance complained of was the noise and disturbance created by the boxing performances which were taking place. A man named Edwin Murray was present in court, and heard a good deal of the proceedings which led to that injunction being granted. He says that he left the court shortly before the actual injunction was pronounced, or before judgment was given, he admits that he knew the result. Notwithstanding that, what was done—I do not say by whom at present—was this. There were arrangements made for having boxing performances in September and October, and on Oct. 9 and 21 some more boxing contests took place. Upon that an application was made to NORTH, J., to commit Paterson for infringement of the injunction. Before that came on for hearing, it appears, Paterson said that Murray was the person who was really responsible for the nuisance. Thereupon, proceedings were taken to commit Murray. He was not a party to the action, either first or last.

Let us pause and consider upon what jurisdiction the court can proceed against Murray. There is no injunction against him—he is no more bound by that injunction than any other member of the public. He is, however, bound, like other members of the public, not to interfere with, and not to obstruct, the course of justice, and the case made against him, if it be anything, must be, not that he has technically infringed the injunction, which has not been granted against him, but that he has been aiding and abetting others in setting the court at defiance, and deliberately treating the order of the court as unworthy of notice. If he has so conducted himself, it is perfectly idle to say that there is no jurisdiction to attach him for contempt, as distinguished from a breach of the injunction, which has a technical meaning. Counsel for Murray has endeavoured to persuade us that there is no such jurisdiction. It startled me, I confess, as an old equity practitioner, to hear the jurisdiction contested if the facts brought the case up to what I have supposed. It has always been familiar to my brother RIGBY and myself that the orders of the court could not be set at naught, and violated by any member of the public, either by interfering with the officers of the court, or by assisting those who were bound by the orders of the court which ought to be obeyed. All that is familiar law, and if authority is required for it it is to be found in Lewes v. Morgan (1); in Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (2); and in Avery v. Andrews (3), where KAY, L.J., upheld that jurisdiction. It is, I think, also to be found in Day v. Longhurst (4).

Counsel for Murray has argued very strenuously that there is no such jurisdiction, founding his argument on a passage in LORD ELDON's judgment in Iveson v. Harris (5). Iveson v. Harris (5) was a case of prohibition, and LORD ELDON, differing from a view taken by the Court of Exchequer with respect to proceedings on a bail bond not being a proceeding against a prohibition restraining the original action so as to incur a contempt, as to which I say nothing, says this (7 Ves. at pp. 256, 257) :

“I have no conception that it is competent to this court to hold a man bound by an injunction who is not a party in the cause for the purpose of the cause.

A The old practice was that he must be brought into court, so as according to the ancient laws and usages of the country to be made a subject of the writ. The jurisdiction in lunacy is quite distinct."

That strikes me as perfectly right. LORD ELDON is addressing himself there to persons bound by the injunction; he is not considering those persons who assist others in setting the court at defiance; he does not deal with that class of persons at all. The law is there defined in a way which is familiar to anybody accustomed to the procedure in Chancery. A notice of motion to commit a man for breach of an injunction, which is technically wrong unless he is bound by the injunction, and a notice of motion to commit a man for contempt of court, not because he is bound by the injunction by being a party to the cause or anything of that kind, but because he is conducting himself so as to obstruct the course of justice, are totally different things. The difference is very marked. In the one case the party who is bound by the injunction is proceeded against; the proceedings against him are for the purpose of enforcing the order of the court for the benefit of the person who got the order. In the other case the court will not allow its process to be set at nought, and treated with contempt. The consequence is that in the one case the person who is interested in enforcing the order is enforcing it for his own benefit, while, in the other case, if the order of the court has been contumaciously set at naught, he cannot settle it with the person so acting and save that person from the consequences of his act. The difference between the two kinds of contempt is perfectly well known, although in some cases there may be a little difficulty in saying on which side of the line they fall.

E As to the jurisdiction, if the facts indicate what I have stated, I have not the slightest doubt; and, notwithstanding the arguments on behalf of Murray, I cannot bring myself to see any difficulty about it. The facts, of course, are all important, and I agree at once that, if I can accept Murray's suggestion that he was present on the two occasions referred to simply as a spectator—if that were really true in substance—I cannot regard him as having done anything which justified the court in making an order against him. I should think that that was not anything like enough. But let us see. What is Murray? I will not allude now to his past career. It is quite unnecessary to go into that. What is his connection with the club? Murray and a friend of his called Coaney, alias Brown, give Paterson references; Murray introduces Paterson to Mr. Norris, his solicitor; Murray from first to last finances Paterson. Paterson has not got any money; he wants £300 or £400 to furnish the club and get a billiards-table, and he gets all his money from Murray. Then arises this very important matter. Just before the trial comes on there is a bill of sale, and just after the trial there is an agreement by Paterson to sell the whole of the concern to Murray—whether it is carried through or not I do not know. Murray is said to be an ordinary member of this club, and he evidently takes a very considerable interest in it. He is the man who has found the money, and, so far as I can draw the inference, he carries on the club. It is evident that Paterson was a mere tool of somebody.

I After the injunction there comes the important part of the case. Circulars are sent out to the members of the club informing them of the proposed boxing contests which took place in October. Whoever sent out those circulars, knowing of the injunction, did that which was obviously most improper. I cannot be so blind as to suppose that Murray knew nothing about those things—I cannot imagine it for a moment. At all events, he goes to the place upon those two occasions which are specified; there were thirty or forty people there, and he was then present. We are asked to say that he was there simply as a spectator. I do not believe a word of it. The view taken by NORTH, J., is this:

"Looking at the history of Murray's connection with the club, I have not the least doubt as to the character in which he was present on the occasions in question. He was not there present as a mere spectator, but he was there as one of the persons interested. That, I consider, is proved by the statements which are really not in dispute between the parties, looking at the whole of the evidence."

There is a little ambiguity about that expression, "he was there as one of the persons interested"; but I have not the slightest doubt that Murray was at the bottom of the whole thing. I give him credit for taking a view, which, if there was anything in it, might be of use to him. I daresay he thought that, if these boxing matches were not advertised, and the public were not invited to come, and so on, what was done would not matter. That was not, perhaps, within the objection, but he knew perfectly well that what was within the objection was creating a disturbance, under any circumstances, without having boxing matches. He did not do anything intentionally which he thought would get him into gaol—of course, he did not; he was not so foolish as that. I have not the slightest doubt, therefore, that what was done was a gross breach of the injunction, and that the court would be utterly wrong in acceding to this appeal. It must be dismissed.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I also come to the conclusion that the appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs. The real question to be decided in this case is whether or not Murray, on Oct. 9 and 21, 1896, or either of those dates, was party or privy to—in other words, aided or abetted—Paterson in committing a breach of the injunction which NORTH, J., had granted on July 15, 1896. As regards the law, I have no doubt that the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to commit for contempt a person, who, though not a defendant to the action, and against whom the injunction has not been granted, aids and abets a breach of the injunction, of which he knows, by the defendant. The cases that have been cited and referred to by my brother LINDLEY—first of all, in 1818, in Lewes v. Morgan (1) in the Exchequer, secondly, in 1848, the well-known case of Lord Wellesley v. Earl of Mornington (2), and Avery v. Andrews (3), before KAY, J.—undoubtedly show that the jurisdiction of the court could be exercised under the circumstances I have stated. Now comes the question whether or not it is shown by the evidence here, and shown clearly, that Murray was guilty of the offence charged against him. I agree with LINDLEY, L.J., that a man is not to be sent to gaol unless the evidence is clear that he is guilty of the offence charged against him. If I were not clear on the evidence in this case, or thought the case was not conclusively made out, I should not be a party to sending Murray to gaol for a period of one month. But I have not the slightest doubt that the offence is brought home on substantial evidence—evidence that cannot deceive one—against Murray.

I want to point out how the evidence strikes me strongly. Beginning first of all on Dec. 13, 1895, with the lease, it was a lease of three rooms in a house in Fetter Lane. Boxing entertainments were held in this house in breach of a restrictive covenant. The house had been fitted up, with a ring and seats round it for boxing purposes. In February, 1896, the landlords take proceedings by way of action against Paterson to restrain him from so doing; and on Feb. 13, the landlord moves for an interim injunction up to the date of the hearing. What do I find? I find Murray attending at the hearing of the motion. What did he do that for if, as he put forward at the trial, he had nothing whatever to do with this case? Why does Murray trouble himself by attending NORTH, J.'s, court when an interim injunction is being asked for against a man in whom we are invited to say that Murray had no interest? The action is pending, and we find that in the five months between Feb. 13, 1896, and June 12, 1896, Murray was unquestionably financing Paterson. First of all he pays the costs of the lease to Paterson—£10. Next, he pays the rent in advance—£50. Next, he buys a billiards-table for the premises—paying £76. Lastly, he advances from time to time moneys amounting to the sum of £200, making in all £336 for the purposes I have mentioned. What does he do all that for if he had nothing to do with the matter? He says that it was to oblige Paterson, and that Paterson gave him I O Us. He says that he has not got those I O Us, but that he destroyed them when a bill of sale was given, on June 12, 1896. What was that bill of sale given for? When the circumstances of these loans, as they are now called, from Murray to Paterson come to be investigated, they cannot be made to fit in any way with the bill of sale being given to secure £150 and £50. It seems to me that what was done was for Murray's benefit. Inasmuch as the action against Paterson was coming on to be heard, and it was highly probable that Seaward would succeed, and that the interim injunction would be made perpetual, and that Paterson would be condemned in costs, the best way to prevent Seaward from getting those costs out of Paterson was for Murray to take a bill of sale of all the chattels, so that when the sheriff went in he could say: "You cannot take anything; all these goods are mine."

The action comes on to be heard on July 15, 1896. What do I find then? I find Murray in attendance again upon NORTH, J. What is he there for if he had nothing to do with the proceedings, as he now says? When you are dealing with a conflict of evidence you must take all the circumstances, one fact with the other, and see whether the chain is such as to make a strong chain or a weak chain. The injunction is granted; an order for costs is made; the sheriff goes in; the bill of sale plays its part; and Seaward does not get any of the costs which have been awarded to him. Then I find that, shortly after the injunction is granted, Murray and Paterson are agreeing together that Paterson shall assign to him this lease which was in his name. During this period the club had been going on; and there had undoubtedly been takings at the club. Where did those takings go to? Murray's counsel pointed out to my satisfaction that Paterson was not a man to be entirely believed, because he is contradicted by Mr. Norris, the solicitor whose evidence I have no reason to doubt. On the other hand, I must say that Murray is not to be believed on account of his antecedents; certainly he is not a witness of credit on whom you could place implicit reliance. What does Paterson say? Paterson says they went to one Coaney, alias Brown. Who is Coaney? Coaney is said to be partner to Murray in half shares in the business. If that statement is untrue—and it is a material fact when you are dealing with the question as to what interest Murray had in these premises in Fetter Lane, and in carrying on business there—there are two persons who could have contradicted Paterson. One is the secretary of the club, and the other is Coaney. He is not contradicted upon that. I should say, if the evidence does preponderate one way or the other, that it shows that the takings of this club went into the pocket of Murray's partner Coaney. I am aware that Murray says that, if they did, he knew nothing about it. If these takings did not go to Coaney, to whom did they go? The statement that they went to Coaney is not contradicted, and I certainly arrive at the conclusion that that part of the story is true, and it coincides with the rest of the history of the case which I have traced. As to the outgoings, they, in all probability, came out of the takings.

On Oct. 9 and Oct. 21 breaches of the injunction granted by NORTH, J., unquestionably took place. There could not have been two more flagrant and contumacious breaches than those which are proved by the evidence to have taken place on those dates. Murray was there on both occasions. We have from Murray's cross-examination that, before these two meetings—at which, he says, and his case is, that he was casually present as a spectator and nothing more—circulars were sent out to the members informing them with regard to the proposed boxing contests which were to take place in October. In his affidavit there is a denial of everything that pinches him; but I do not find any manner of denial that he knew these circulars were sent out, but he made a statement which was very significant. In cross-examination he said: "They were not, as far as I know, advertised in the papers." Is this court to believe that Murray was present—I am using his own words—at both meetings as a spectator only? The meaning of that is that he had nothing whatever to do with either of those meetings except as a spectator; and, therefore, he was not an aider and abettor of the flagrant breach of the injunction which took place on those two occasions.

I agree with what was laid down in R. v. Coney (6) by the majority of this court, namely, that the mere fact of a man being present as a spectator at a prize fight, or a boxing exhibition, or a like thing, does not make him an aider or abettor of what is going on. If, however, there is evidence which shows that Murray was not there as a mere spectator only, but had an interest, and was doing what he did as regards the carrying on of this so-called club in Fetter Lane from as early as February, 1896, down to Oct. 21, 1896, I cannot hold otherwise than that it has been clearly proved that he was there aiding and abetting in a breach of the injunction which he knew had been granted, and which he flagrantly disobeyed. For these reasons, I think that my brother NORTH's judgment in this case must be upheld.

RIGBY, L.J.—After the analysis of the evidence that has been given by my brothers, in which I entirely concur, I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything upon that part of the case. I will only say a few words on the argument of counsel for Murray with reference to the jurisdiction of the court in matters of contempt of court with relation to injunctions. Unless I entirely misapprehend that argument, it went so far as that the court has no jurisdiction to commit for contempt by way of punishment, but that the jurisdiction is an ancillary jurisdiction in order to secure that the plaintiff in a suit shall have his rights. I do not think that that can be for a moment supported. I do not remember a case in which it has ever been suggested before in that way, for I am satisfied that the dictum of LORD ELDON in Iveson v. Harris (5) had absolutely nothing to do with this question. The learned judge was quite right, no doubt, in saying that you must look very carefully when a prohibition or an injunction is granted; you must see how far it extends; and you must take care that you do not overstep the meaning of the court with reference to the injunction and bring in people as though they were prohibited or enjoined, when the court never thought of prohibiting or enjoining them. That is true. It has, however, nothing to do with the question of contempt at all. I do not think that that passage is relevant to cases of the present kind at all.

That there is a jurisdiction to punish for contempt of court is undoubted. It has been exercised for a very long time—for longer than any of us can remember. That punitive jurisdiction is founded upon this, that it is not for the good of the plaintiff or a party, but it is for the good of the public, that orders of the courts should not be disregarded, and that people should not place themselves in the position of assisting in the breach of those orders in what is properly called contempt of court. It is astonishing to me that at this date that jurisdiction should be questioned. I will not again refer to the authorities that have been mentioned by LINDLEY, L.J., and, to some extent, by A. L. SMITH, L.J. I will only say what occurred to me at the commencement of this case. The matter was greatly discussed in Yelverton's Case (Re Bahama Islands, Special Reference from) (7) before the Privy Council, where there were judges of very great experience and very great knowledge. There the whole question of contempt was considered in a very much more exhaustive manner than I have known in any other case. As appears from the opinion which is printed in the report of the case, the Privy Council, not as new law, but as it were incidentally, and, therefore, in a more important manner, did support this view of the punitive jurisdiction. They advised Her Majesty that the prerogative of the Crown in cases of punitive contempt, which they took for granted, extended to a remittal of the sentence. In that opinion it was not necessary for them to take the other side of the question, but I apprehend that it is undoubted, irrespective of the decision in the Privy Council, that it is the practice of the representative of the Crown, the Secretary of State for the time being, to interfere in the other branch of cases of committal for contempt, when the contempt consists in the refusal to do that which is right to a party litigant. The two cases are broadly

A distinguishable; but it was astonishing to me, as I said before, to have it argued that there are not two branches at all, but that the last branch—that is, the interest of a party litigant—is the only thing that gives jurisdiction to the court. I entirely deny it, and I do not now that it has ever before been asserted.

B With reference to the particular case now before us, it is said that this present proceeding is only for the benefit of the plaintiff. It is quite true that, in cases of this kind, the court does not act of itself. It is quite true that there is no public informer, or public officer charged with the duty of bringing before the court cases of contempt. In the vast majority of cases, I do not think it is necessary that it should be so. You might conceive of cases in which it would be different, but in the vast majority of cases it is upon the information brought by a party to an action that the court commits for contempt, or entertains the question of committing for contempt. C But I entirely dissent from the suggestion that that party can, when once the court is seised of the matter, exercise any influence at all. Sometimes there is an appeal to the court, just as there may be to a judge who is about to inflict a sentence in any case. The prosecutor may say: “Perhaps you will take into consideration this and that, and the other thing, and not be so severe.” D He may go to that extent, but the court acts upon its own jurisdiction, upon its own authority, and without more regard than I have suggested to the wishes and feelings of the person who has brought the matter before the court. It is perfectly clear that the cases in which the plaintiff or a party litigant can waive a right have nothing to do with a case like the present.

E I have no doubt whatever of the jurisdiction here; and I have no doubt that the facts call for an exercise of that jurisdiction. Although the warning can never be too frequently repeated that the court must be very careful how it acts in matters where the discretion is so wide, and the jurisdiction so extensive and important, I do not question for a moment that this is one of those cases in which the jurisdiction ought to be exercised, and the sentence ought to be an exemplary one. I have no doubt whatever that the aiding and abetting a breach of the injunction here F on the part of Murray was both wilful, and in a high degree, reprehensible. I cannot think that the committal, which NORTH, J., has pronounced against him was in any way excessive, and I do not think, therefore, that we ought to attempt to interfere.

Appeal by the defendant in the action from a decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session (the Lord Justice-Clerk, LORD MACDONALD, LORD YOUNG and LORD TRAYNER), affirming with a variation a decision of the Lord Ordinary, LORD LOW.

The action was brought by the respondents against the appellant bank to recover damages for misrepresentations made by one Scott, an agent of the bank, whereby the respondents were induced to accept bills for the accommodation of a firm named Douglas, Reid & Co. to the amount of £4,000. The representations made by Scott were to the effect (i) that Douglas, Reid & Co. were in a sound financial position, and only required some temporary help; (ii) that the sum due by them to the bank was not large; (iii) that they had made up certain losses which they had previously sustained; (iv) that no portion of the proceeds

A of the respondents' acceptances would be applied towards the extinction of the debt due to the bank. In the course of the argument their Lordships expressed an opinion that the respondents had not sufficiently averred that the fourth representation alleged to have been made by the appellant Scott had not in fact, if made, been given effect to by the bank. The respondents proposed to amend the record by adding the following averments :

B "In fact the object of procuring the pursuers to accept the bills . . . was to pay off with their proceeds existing debts due to the bank by Douglas, Reid & Co. on account-current contrary to the fourth assurance above set forth. Had it not been for the said assurance the pursuers would not have accepted any of the bills."

C The acceptances

"were applied in extinction pro tanto of the bank's debt contrary to the assurances given as aforesaid. If the said acceptances had not been granted and applied as aforesaid, the bank's ultimate loss would have been larger by the amount of the said bills, viz, £4,000, with interest thereon. The result was that the bank obtained and the pursuers lost the said sum of £4,000 and interest."

D The appellants pleaded that these representations were not in writing as required by s. 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1856, and were therefore of no effect. The respondents contended that the fact that the representations were made in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme, to enable Douglas, Reid & Co. to raise money with which to pay off their debt to the bank, took them out of the operation of the section, and the courts below gave effect to this contention. It was not alleged that the directors of the bank were parties to the fraud, but it was said that Scott was acting within the scope of his employment in making the representations.

E The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Graham Murray, Q.C.), Ure, and King, all of the Scottish Bar, for the appellants.

Balfour, Q.C., (of the Scottish Bar), Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., and Robertson, Q.C., for the respondents.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—The averments now seem to me to be clear. To use the language of English pleading, facts are set out from which it would appear that there has been a combination to induce the respondents to advance a sum of money under circumstances in which it was to the advantage of the bank and to the advantage of those who persuaded the respondents to allow the debtors, who were in difficulties which might lead to their sudden bankruptcy, to continue carrying on their business. If the allegations with which I am about to deal had been to the effect that in pursuance of that combination the bank had managed to get their own debt paid, and the person who signed the bills had been induced to sign them by the false representation that it was intended to enable the debtor to carry on his business so as, perhaps, to recover himself, but that in lieu of that the bank had appropriated the whole of the new advances to pay off their own past debt, I am of opinion that there would have been a good cause of action shown upon the face of this record. But after the discussion which has taken place, and after what has been pointed out as to the ambiguous language used in the pleadings, it is manifest to me that no such thing can be averred, and that it is perfectly consistent with every allegation on this record that, on receiving these new advances, the bank applied them to the credit of the debtor. Although in a certain sense it may be that at the end the bank was less a loser than it would otherwise have been by reason of this advance, yet the only thing which makes it properly a cause of action is omitted from this condescendence. Therefore, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Inner House ought to be reversed, the action remitted, and the defenders assoilzied. The language of an English pleader would be, that whatever was the contract intended to be entered into, and entered into in fact, there was no breach upon the face of this record properly assigned. There is nothing which shows that the thing that was to be done by the bank was not done and done bona fide with the intention of helping the person who was in difficulties. I should have been reluctant to have given judgment against the pursuer in this case on the ground only of the ambiguous language of pleading, but after more than a week's delay, and seeing the amendments which are now proposed, it seems to me that with great astuteness and skill in the use of language the pleader has repeated exactly the same thing in different words, and has expressly avoided doing that which would have set out a complete cause of action. Under these circumstances it appears to me that all your Lordships can do is to allow the appeal and remit the action to the court below to assoilzie the defenders, and find the respondents liable in expenses. A B C

LORD WATSON.—The main question involved in this appeal is new to the law of Scotland, although it arises upon the terms of a statute which was passed in 1856. Section 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act of that year enacts : D

“All representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings of any person, made or granted to the effect or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods, of postponement of the payment of debt or of any other obligation demandable from him, shall be in writing, and shall be subscribed by the person making such representations and assurances, or by some person duly authorised by him, otherwise the same shall have no effect.” E

This enactment is in substance the same as the provisions of s. 6 of the Statute of Frauds Amendment Act, 1828, commonly known as Lord Tenterden's Act, which applies to England and Ireland. There is this difference of expression between the clauses, that in the earlier statute it is declared, not that the representations and assurances shall be of no effect, but that no action shall be maintainable upon them when they are not contained in a writing duly subscribed. F

This is an action of damages brought by the respondents founded upon representations alleged to have been falsely and fraudulently made to them by the appellant Scott, who was agent in Dundee for the appellant bank, for the purpose and with the effect of inducing them to sign bills of exchange to the amount of £4,000 for the accommodation of the firm of Douglas, Reid & Co. It is alleged that the main object which Scott had in view in making these representations was to enable the bank to apply the proceeds of the bills so procured in reduction of a large overdraft which was then due to it by the firm accommodated. It is not asserted that the directors, or any official of the bank other than Scott, were in the knowledge of his fraudulent proceedings, but it is averred that the representations made by him were within the scope of his employment as agent, and there are also averments which are said to mean that the bank did in fact receive the proceeds of the bills and apply the same in extinction of the debt due to it from Douglas, Reid & Co. It is admitted by the respondents that all the representations upon which they rely were made by Scott verbally. These representations were—(i) That Douglas, Reid & Co. were in a sound condition financially, and only required temporary accommodation; (ii) that the sum due by them to the bank was very trifling; (iii) that Douglas, Reid & Co. had made up the losses which they had previously sustained through the failure of the firm of Lipman & Co. by fortunate speculations in jute; and (iv) that no portion of the proceeds of any acceptance by the respondents would be applied towards extinction of the bank's debt, or of any obligation to the bank. In their defences the appellants pleaded that these representations, being neither in writing nor subscribed as the Act of 1856 requires, were of no effect, and could not be admitted to proof. The plea was overruled by the Lord Ordinary, G H I

A LORD Low, who allowed the parties, before answer, a proof of their respective averments. The Second Division of the court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and, instead of a proof before answer, appointed issues to be lodged for the trial of the cause.

B All the learned judges in the courts below were of opinion that the circumstances of the case, as disclosed in the condescendence, took these representations out of the statute of 1856. The Lord Justice-Clerk held it to be sufficient for that purpose that the representations were made in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme, by means of which the bills were obtained, on the assurances of its agent, for the purposes of the bank. The same view was more clearly indicated by LORD YOUNG and LORD TRAYNER, who were of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the representations would have been within the statute if they had been made for the sole purpose of inducing the respondents to accept the bills, but that they were excluded from its operation because they were made for an ulterior purpose which is not mentioned in the statute, namely, in order that the bank might be enabled to obtain payment of its claims against Douglas, Reid & Co. The fourth representation does not appear to me to involve the construction of the statute. It differs from those which precede it in this respect, that it does not contain any assurance relating to Douglas, Reid & Co., or to their credit, ability, or trade. In my opinion, it does not possess the character of a representation to which the statute applies. In the view of the law which was adopted by the courts below, the distinction between the fourth and the first three of the representations libelled on was immaterial.

E The provisions of s. 6 are expressed in terms as comprehensive as they are imperative. They enact that no verbal representations, being of the character, and made for the purpose and with the intent specified in the section, shall be of any legal effect as giving a remedy to the person who may be misled by them to his detriment. They in substance provide that no person to whom such verbal representations are made for such a purpose shall have any right to rely upon them, and that if he does choose to act upon them, he must bear the consequences of his own credulity. It is also, in my opinion, obvious that these provisions were not intended to meet the case of truthful and honest representations, and that they necessarily include all representations of the character, and made with the purpose specified, however false and however fraudulent. In the present case it has hardly been controverted, and it does not appear to me to admit of serious dispute, that the first three of the representations upon which the action is laid answer precisely both in character and in their immediate object to the description contained in s. 6. But it has been argued (and the argument found favour with the learned judges of the Court of Session) that the first three of these representations are not within the incidence of s. 6, because they are alleged to have been made, not merely with the immediate purpose of inducing the respondents to sign accommodation bills, but with the further and fraudulent purpose of enabling the bank to appropriate the bills, when granted, to the payment of its debts. I do not think that the argument has any solid foundation in fact.

G The main, if not the only, cause of action disclosed by the condescendence is the fraudulent procuring of the respondent's acceptance of the bills in question by means of these representations. But I am of opinion that, even if it be warranted by the facts, the argument is without foundation in law. It seeks to limit the generality of the enactments of s. 6 by introducing a proviso to the effect that they shall not apply in cases where the person making the representations has in view some ulterior and illegitimate purpose, beyond inducing the person to whom they are made to give credit or money to a third party. There is no warrant for such a limitation to be found in the words of the section, which, in my opinion, declare explicitly that any verbal representation to which they apply shall be absolutely inefficacious, no matter what may be the further and fraudulent design of the person who made it.

It was maintained for the respondents that the competency of proving these representations by parol has been established by s. 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provides :

“In any judicial proceeding in Scotland, any fact relating to a bill of exchange, bank cheque, or promissory note, which is relevant to any question, may be proved by parol evidence.”

It may well be doubted whether the present action does raise any question of liability upon the respondents' accommodation bills, but it is an obvious answer to the argument that in the present and similar cases such verbal representations have since the Act of 1856 ceased to be relevant facts. It is possible that the fourth representation might be founded on, either as being a fraudulent inducement to sign bills for the accommodation of Douglas, Reid & Co. or as constituting a promise or agreement binding the bank to abstain from imputing any part of the proceeds of these bills towards payment of its debt. But in neither of these aspects do I find any relevant allegation in the condescendence. It is not averred that the bank has failed to fulfil the representation said to have been made by its agent. The only averment upon this point, which occurs in the 8th article of the condescendence, is that the respondents' acceptances

“were all placed to the credit of the said Douglas, Reid & Co.'s overdrawn account-current with the Clydesdale Bank at the several dates when the pursuers' said acceptances were obtained as aforesaid. The defenders, the Clydesdale Bank, were thus lucrati to the extent of the said acceptances.”

These allegations are quite consistent with the possibility that the whole of the sums so credited were drawn out by Douglas, Reid & Co., and by them applied to their own purposes, and are, therefore, irrelevant.

Your Lordships delayed the consideration of this appeal in order that the respondents might have an opportunity of submitting any amendment showing that the bank had applied the proceeds of these acceptances in reduction of the balance due to it by Douglas, Reid & Co. The respondents have proposed to add two new averments, the first being that the acceptances were “applied in extinction pro tanto of the bank's debt;” and the second, that,

“if the said acceptances had not been granted and applied as aforesaid the bank's ultimate loss would have been larger by the amount of the said bills, viz., £4,000 and interest thereon.”

I see no reason to doubt that these amendments have been very properly framed with a strict regard to the limits of truth, but in my opinion, they come far short of relevancy. So far from negating they appear to me rather to suggest that the appellant bank not only allowed to Douglas, Reid & Co. the free use of the proceeds of the respondents' acceptances, but made new advances to that firm out of its own funds. I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from must be reversed, with costs; and that the action ought to be remitted to the Second Division of the Court of Session, with directions to assoilzie the appellants from its conclusions, with expenses in both courts below.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The action is founded upon four matters, the statement of which is contained in the fifth condescendence. It cannot be doubted that the first three complaints are founded upon statements made by the appellants' agent with reference to the “character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings” of Douglas, Reid & Co. Apart from the provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1856, no doubt can be entertained that the condescendence discloses relevant facts establishing a cause of action against the appellants.

The objection taken on their behalf to the relevancy of the condescendence is founded upon the provisions of that enactment. The respondents seek to avoid the

- A operation of the statute so far as they are concerned in the present case, and have succeeded in obtaining judgment in their favour on the ground that the representations made were part of a scheme fraudulently devised by the appellants and Douglas, Reid & Co. for the purpose of benefiting the bank at the expense of the respondents. In my opinion, the operation of the statute cannot be so avoided. Assuming that the respondents could establish that the representations were made
- B for the purpose of giving effect to such a fraudulent scheme, I am of opinion that the enactment positively forbids any effect being given to those representations. It is impossible to conceive an enactment in more general or unambiguous terms, "all representations and assurances" of the nature described, unless in writing, are to have no effect. The action of the respondents, if it is to be maintained, requires as its foundation that effect should be given to those representations which the
- C statute has said shall have no effect. I do not see how it is open to question that the representations were within the words of the statute, because the statute applies to all such representations made or granted to the effect or "for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods," etc. The very framework of the respondents' case is that the representations had the effect of rendering them liable upon certain bills of exchange, which resulted in money being paid to the bank for
- D the accommodation of Douglas, Reid & Co. How, then, it can be said that they were not made or granted to the effect of enabling those persons to obtain credit or money it is difficult to see, but if the statute in terms applies, how is it possible to avoid its operation by proving that the design of the bank and of Douglas, Reid & Co. in making the representations, and so procuring the credit was an ulterior benefit to the bank?
- E The respondents also maintain that s. 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, dispenses in such a case as this, inasmuch as obligations on bills of exchange come in question, with the necessity of the writing which is required by the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act. I think that it is an argument which it is difficult to treat seriously. It is impossible to conceive that s. 100 of the Act can have
- F repealed pro tanto the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act whenever obligations upon bills of exchange have been obtained by representations as to conduct, credit or character.

That disposes of the case so far as regards the first three allegations contained in the condescendence. The fourth allegation is quite independent of the statute; it is

- G "that no portion of the proceeds of any acceptance by the pursuers would be applied in extinction of the bank's debt."

- I think that allegation is only relevant if it can be maintained as a representation made by the bank to the respondents, upon which they acted, being a false and fraudulent representation. If it is a promise only it would not be relevant, because the respondents would have no title to sue in respect of its breach. But no doubt
- H that which is in form a promise may be in another aspect a representation, and I think that the fourth averment of the fifth condescendence may be treated as relating to a representation by the bank which is alleged to be false and fraudulent. Taking it to be so, I do not think that, when you take the whole of the condescendences together, it is shown that the bank did make a false and fraudulent representation of an intention which they never intended to carry out, because that is what it must
- I amount to. So far as appears, the bank, if they indicated an intention that the money should not be used in extinction of the debt, carried out that intention. There is no allegation that they did not give full effect to that which they alleged to be the intention. It was open, perhaps, to some argument, as the case stood, whether the allegations in the subsequent condescendences had not been from want of care so framed as to be consistent with that intention either being carried out or not being carried out. Accordingly, an opportunity was given to the respondents to suggest any amendment which they would desire to make with a view of clearing up the doubt which might be said to exist. Having had ample opportunity of considering what averments they could add, they have failed to suggest to your Lordships any averments as capable of proof by them which would show that the bank did not intend that the money should not be applied in extinction of their debt, looking at the substance of the matter and not at the form, and that the alleged intention was not given effect to. For these reasons I think that the action altogether fails, and I entirely concur in the order which has been proposed. A

LORD DAVEY.—I also concur in the order which your Lordships propose to make in this appeal, and also in the reasons which have been assigned for it. It is worthy of observation that the fifth article of the condescendence which contains the representations alleged to have been made by or on behalf of the bank, commences with the averment that those representations were made on the occasion of Douglas, Reid & Co. requiring temporary accommodation. It then avers that Mr. Paton, one of the pursuers, saw Mr. Scott, the manager of the bank, who made the four representations relied upon. B C

We have it then that those representations were made upon the occasion of Douglas, Reid & Co. requiring temporary accommodation from the pursuer's firm, and this pursuer, accordingly, seeing the manager of the bank. It cannot be disputed, I think, that the three first of these representations contained in the fifth article of the condescendence are "representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings," of the firm of Douglas, Reid & Co., and it is scarcely denied that they were made for the purpose of enabling the firm of Douglas, Reid & Co. to obtain credit or money from the pursuers. If so, they would seem prima facie to fall within s. 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1856. But it is said that, although they were made for that purpose, there was an ulterior purpose or motive for obtaining the credit for Douglas, Reid & Co. from the pursuers, which was of a fraudulent character, and takes the case out of the statute. I entirely concur in the observation that has been made, that, if it was intended to except representations made with a fraudulent motive, or representations of a fraudulent character, from that statute, an exception to that effect would have been introduced into the statute. Indeed, it appears to me that if you introduce such an exception into the Scottish statute or into the English statute which is known by the name of Lord Tenterden's Act, you will to a large extent, I should say almost entirely, nullify the beneficial operation of the statute, because what are the cases in which the statute comes into play? D E F

In England, and I believe also in Scotland, you cannot maintain an action upon a representation unless that representation is made fraudulently. An innocent representation, that is to say, a representation made by a man who believes what he is saying, is not actionable in England, and I believe that it is not actionable in Scotland. At any rate, the class of representations in which the question which was intended to be dealt with by those two statutes occurs are usually and for the most part fraudulent representations, or it is sufficient to say that they may be, and if you excluded representations of a fraudulent character, or representations made fraudulently or with a fraudulent purpose from those statutes, you would, in my opinion, do away with at least half their beneficial operation. Therefore I think that it is no answer to the plea of the defenders that the case falls within s. 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, to reply that these representations were made with a fraudulent motive or were of a fraudulent character; consequently I am of opinion that, having regard to the language of s. 6 of the Act, the present action is not maintainable upon these three first averments of representations by the defenders. G H I

With regard to the fourth representation, I will assume that it may be read as a representation of a fact. I have considerable doubt whether in the form in which it is alleged, being an allegation of an intention and not of a fact, it is not giving too benevolent a construction to the pleadings so to read it, but for the present purpose I will assume that it is an allegation of fact, and that it is a representation of the

A purpose for which the acceptances were required from the pursuers. But treating it so, it would not, I agree, be within s. 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act; it would be outside that statute. To make it actionable you would require allegations, not only that that representation was made fraudulently, but also that it was acted upon, and that the defenders suffered damage by such acting. It was agreed on all hands by your Lordships that the allegation in the condescendence as it stands was wholly insufficient to allege any such damage, because it merely alleged that the £4,000 were paid to the overdrawn account of Douglas, Reid & Co. with the Clydesdale Bank, and that "the Clydesdale Bank were thus lucrati to the extent of the proceeds of the said acceptances," leaving it perfectly open and perfectly uncertain whether the Clydesdale Bank, although they immediately got the benefit of the £4,000, did not afterwards allow Douglas, Reid & Co. to draw to that extent for the purposes of their business, so that the £4,000 really and in substance would go in the manner in which it was averred it was intended to go.

Your Lordships have given the respondents an opportunity of amending their condescendence, in case what I conceive to be the obvious meaning of it was only a slip. Possibly if the amendment which they propose had been in the condescendence in the first instance, it might have been considered sufficient; but I am bound to say that after the respondents had heard what had been said by your Lordships, and had known exactly where the shoe pinched, and where the averment was insufficient, if they had been able to aver that Douglas, Reid & Co. were not allowed to draw £4,000 after the bills had been paid into the bank for the purposes of their business, I cannot conceive that they would not have said so. Instead of that, they propose to insert an allegation which is, to my mind, perfectly consistent with the fact that Douglas, Reid & Co. were allowed to draw and did in fact draw out £4,000 after having placed it to their credit with the bank, because what they say is, that "the bank's ultimate loss would have been larger by the amount of the said bills, namely, £4,000 and interest thereon." That is perfectly susceptible of the construction that it means the ultimate loss of the bank having regard to further advances made against the £4,000. That I believe to be the true construction of the amendment, but it is sufficient to say that, in my opinion, it wholly fails to meet the requirements which, it was pointed out to the respondents by your Lordships, should be met in any amendment which they proposed to make of their pleadings. Under these circumstances I think that it would be a wilful and wanton waste of expense to allow the defenders to go to trial upon the fourth representation contained in the fifth article of the condescendence.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I wish to say that LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD MORRIS concur in the opinions which your Lordships have delivered. For myself, I wish to add that if I only dealt with the fourth question in the condescendence in the opinion which I have just expressed to your Lordships, it was because I really, with all respect to those learned persons who have looked into the matter, thought that the question with regard to the statute was too plain for argument. But as my silence upon that question might be supposed to indicate some difference of opinion, I wish to say that I entirely concur in the construction of the statute which has been placed upon it by my noble and learned friends.

A railway company gave a landowner notices to treat in respect of certain land together with the stone, sand, and other minerals thereunder excepting all mines and seams of coal. The question of the amount of compensation to be paid to the landowner having been referred to arbitration, the company obtained a rule nisi to set aside the submission on the ground of misreception of evidence by the arbitrator.

Held: (i) the question of compensation was governed by ss. 77-85 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, to the exclusion of the common law rules as to the rights of the parties which would have been applicable if the land had been bought by agreement; (ii) compensation with regard to the coal left was to be determined in accordance with ss. 77-85, not at once, but when the landowner gave the company notice of his intention to work the coal; (iii) if the company did not then acquire the coal, there was a necessary implication that the landowner could go through the surface of the acquired land in order to get at the coal.

B Appeal by Lord Gerard from a decision of the Divisional Court (MATHEW and KENNEDY, JJ.) making absolute a rule nisi to revoke a submission to arbitration.

In June, 1889, the London and North Western Rail. Co. gave Lord Gerard, in the exercise of their statutory powers, a notice to treat in respect of certain lands, "together with the stone, sand, clay, and gravel within and under the same." With the consent of Lord Gerard, the company shortly afterwards entered upon and took possession of the land. In July, 1891, the company gave to Lord Gerard C a second notice to treat in respect of other land, "together with the mines and minerals thereunder, except all mines, beds, and seams of coal," and subsequently entered upon and took possession of that land. In May, 1894, an agreement was made between Lord Gerard and the company, by which it was agreed to refer to an arbitrator the determination of the amount to be paid to Lord Gerard for the purchase of the lands and minerals taken by the company, and the compensation D payable to him for damage by severance or otherwise injuriously affecting his other lands and minerals in consequence of the exercise of their statutory powers by the company. The coal lying beneath the land taken, and beneath the land adjacent to the land taken, was not being worked at the date of the arbitration, and there was no immediate prospect of its being worked. At the arbitration evidence was tendered on behalf of Lord Gerard in support of a claim for compensation because E he would have to leave unworked large quantities of coal subjacent and adjacent to the land taken by the company, in order to afford the necessary vertical and lateral support to such land; and also because it would be impossible to work the coal without taking away part of the land taken by the company; and also because, having no power or right to remove or pass through the land so taken, he would be prevented from working certain coal belonging to him, either at all, or at the same F cost as that at which he might otherwise have worked it.

By the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 :

G "Section 77. The company shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, iron-stone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased; and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby.

H "Section 78. If the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the railway or any of the works connected therewith, or within the prescribed distance, or where no distance shall be prescribed, forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier, shall give to the company notice in writing of his intention so to do thirty days before the commencement of working; and upon the receipt of such notice it shall be lawful for the company to cause such mines to be inspected by any person appointed by them for the purpose; and if it appear to the company I that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railway, and if the company be willing to make compensation for such mines or part thereof to such owner, lessee, or occupier thereof, then he shall not work or get the same; and if the company and such owner, lessee, or occupier do not agree as to the amount of such compensation, the same shall be settled as in other cases of disputed compensation.

"Section 79. If before the expiration of such thirty days the company do not state their willingness to treat with such owner, lessee, or occupier for the payment of such compensation, it shall be lawful for him to work the said mines or any part thereof for which the company shall not have agreed to pay compensation, so that the same be done in a manner proper and necessary for the beneficial working thereof, and according to the usual manner of working such mines in the district where the same shall be situate; and if any damage or obstruction be occasioned to the railway or works by improper working of such mines, the same shall be forthwith repaired or removed, as the case may require, and such damage made good, by the owner, lessee, or occupier of such mines or minerals, and at his own expense; and if such repair or removal be not forthwith done, or, if the company shall so think fit, without waiting for the same to be done by such owner, lessee, or occupier, it shall be lawful for the company to execute the same, and recover from such owner, lessee, or occupier the expense occasioned thereby by action in any of the superior courts."

The evidence in support of those claims was admitted by the arbitrator, and the railway company obtained a rule nisi to set aside the submission upon the ground of improper reception of evidence by the arbitrator. Upon argument this rule was made absolute by the Divisional Court (MATHEW and KENNEDY, JJ.). Lord Gerard appealed.

Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., and Fletcher Moulton, Q.C. (Pollard with them) for Lord Gerard.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., H. D. Greene, Q.C., and Ernest Page for the railway company.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The London and North Western Railway Co. resolved to carry their railway through certain parts of the property of Lord Gerard, and, therefore, gave him notices to take certain portions of his property. The railway company had resolved to purchase not merely the surface of the land, but also to take a considerable part of the land under the surface. The part under the surface included certain minerals. There were under that land several strata of minerals, the one under the other; there were strata of gravel and clay, and under those two minerals there was a long seam of coal. What the railway company proposed to take was land; it was none the less land, because it was partly composed of minerals.

It has been determined by authority that, under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, "land" means not merely the surface or crust of the land. The word "surface" is not used in the Act. "Land" means everything which the railway company proposes to take, including minerals. The Act allows a railway company to take a portion only of that which is land; if a part of the land consists of minerals they may take a portion of the land, leaving the minerals. Here the railway company proposed to take the whole of the land down to the coal. The coal, therefore, was beneath the land which they proposed to take. That is the transaction between the railway company and the landowner, for which compensation has to be made. I am of opinion that the meaning of the Act of Parliament is that, as soon as a railway company has resolved to take a portion only of the land, the case is at once governed by ss. 77-85, and that it is not only within those sections, but those sections are the sole and absolute code for determining the obligations of both parties. From that moment no common law rights exist, but statutory rights only, according to the construction of the Act. I think that Holliday v. Wakefield Corpn. (1) gives to that interpretation of the statute the authority of the House of Lords. It is so stated by LORD WATSON most clearly, and also by LORD HALSBURY. Therefore, upon the true construction of the statute, and upon the authority of the House of Lords, the proposition is clear that, whenever the position is created by virtue of the exercise of the powers conferred by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the whole subject of the rights of the parties as to land taken and minerals left is regulated solely by ss. 77 to 85.

In the present case it is clear that the railway company, in the exercise of the powers given by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, resolved to take

A land under which there was this coal mine. Those facts bring the case within s. 77, which provides that

B “the company shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away, or used in the construction of the works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased; and all such mines, excepting as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands, unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby.”

C The railway company has taken land, including gravel and clay, and under that land there is the coal mine. With regard to any compensation for the land taken, that is to be determined under the Act of Parliament. The railway company have left the coal, and any dispute between the parties as to compensation of any kind in consequence of the coal being left, is to be determined under ss. 77-85, and in no other way.

D Section 78 says that, if the owner of any mines or minerals lying under the railway, or within the prescribed distance, is desirous of working the same, he shall give the company notice in writing of his intention to do so; and that the company, if it appears to them that the working will damage the railway, may compensate the owner, and the owner shall not work such mines or minerals. Therefore, although the coal mine is left to Lord Gerard as his absolute property, yet some right is taken away from him by s. 78, because he cannot work his coal without first giving notice to the railway company. He has to give this notice for the purpose of giving the railway company the power of buying the coal, even against his will, when he is about to work it. That is my view of the object of the notice required by s. 78. Then compensation is to be given for the coal mine at that time by buying it, but not until then. It is contended that it is not so in this case, because the railway company have bought, not only the ordinary surface soil, but also the two layers of gravel and clay below the surface. Those mines are under the surface and within the terms of ss. 77-85, but it is said that those sections do not apply because those two mines were bought, and those sections apply only when ordinary surface is bought. We do not agree with that contention, and there is nothing in the Act which supports it.

F Another point was taken. It was contended that the compensation with regard to the coal left should be determined at once, because Lord Gerard can never work that coal and it has become dead to him. Let us look at the Act to see if it says that compensation for coal left must be determined at once if it is shown that it never can be got. I will assume here that it never can be got, though I do not think that is so, for the owner could work the coal. At common law, if by agreement the surface was sold and the minerals below were reserved and nothing more was agreed to, it would be a necessary implication in favour of the vendor, if he could not otherwise get at the minerals, that a right was reserved to him to go through the surface in order to get at the minerals. Under the statute the same thing is done without an agreement. The surface is taken, and the minerals are left. Is the owner in that case in a worse position? Clearly not, in my opinion. The railway company has taken the surface and left the mine, and it is a necessary implication that the right is left to the owner to go through the surface to get at the minerals if necessary. I would say that it was so even if there were no authority to that effect, otherwise there would be a manifest injustice. Whether the difficulty is vertical or horizontal makes no difference; the owner can go either way through the land bought. I would have so held upon principle. There is, however, clear authority upon the point, that the rule is the same under the statute as at common law. All the propositions put forward by Lord Gerard, therefore, fail. It is not true that the owner cannot get at his coal; and, even if were true, the time for compensation has not yet arrived. When the time comes for working the coal, if the railway company do not buy it, the owner can work it by going through the land which the railway company have purchased, even if by so doing the railway is let down, and regardless of any consequences to the land bought by the railway company. The claim altogether fails, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The judgment of the court below was right. There was an arbitration under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Evidence was received by the arbitrator as to the value of certain coal, and the question is whether that evidence was properly admitted. I am of opinion that it was not admissible. The railway company gave Lord Gerard two notices to treat in respect of land owned by him. By those notices they proposed to purchase the land with all the subjacent minerals except the coal. Lord Gerard contends that he is entitled to present compensation in respect of the coal. He says that by reason of some of the minerals being taken he would have to leave large quantities of coal unworked, or would have to work it at a far greater cost, and that he is, therefore, entitled to be paid present compensation in respect of the coal. If he is right, the railway company is in no better position than if they had given notice to buy the coal. Lord Gerard says that this coal cannot be worked without affecting the minerals purchased by the railway company. The question has also been raised as to the severance of two parts of Lord Gerard's property by the barrier of minerals bought by the railway company.

The answer to all these allegations is, that this case is provided for by ss. 77-85 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Those sections apply not only when a railway company takes land with the minerals beneath, but also whenever any minerals are not taken with the land. That was the opinion of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and of LORD WATSON, in Holliday v. Wakefield Corpn. (1). LORD WATSON there says ([1891] A.C. at p. 97):

“The mines clauses are, in my opinion, equivalent to an exception (even in cases where minerals are taken) from the provisions of s. 6, with respect to compensation. These clauses are framed in general terms, and appear to me to be applicable to the case of all minerals, save those which are expressly purchased and conveyed to the undertakers.”

“No compensation, I think, for injuriously affecting can at any time be demanded under the 6th section, since I think the rights of compensation are exhaustively dealt with under the mining sections.”

This case is entirely governed by the code contained in ss. 77-84 of the Act. I do not propose to refer particularly to those sections, except to say that s. 77 provides that the railway company is not entitled to minerals unless they have been expressly purchased, and s. 78 provides that minerals near the railway are not to be worked under or within the prescribed distance of the railway until the owner has given thirty days' notice of his intention so to do, and that, “if it appears to the company that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railway,” the company may compensate, and the owner shall not work those minerals. Those words, “if it appear to the company,” etc., are very material. I wish to observe upon that, that if Lord Gerard's contention were right, then the power of determining whether damage was likely to be done to the railway is taken away from the railway company. If compensation can now be claimed for the coal, then the railway company will not have the power to determine in the future whether damage is likely to be done under s. 78. Perhaps this coal may never be desired to be worked, and that is a strong reason in favour of our conclusion.

I think the judgment given in the court below is an excellent judgment. I wish to adopt this passage in that judgment ([1894] 2 Q.B. at pp. 921, 922):

A "We see nothing in these sections to render their provisions inapplicable to a case in which the railway company has, as in the present case, purchased with the 'lands' certain specified subjacent minerals, but has left the others to the owner—nothing which confines their provisions for the adjustment of the relations between the railway company and the owner of subjacent minerals to the case of the purchase of lands only. We fail to find any ground for the B distinction, contended for by Lord Gerard's counsel, between letting down surface soil and letting down minerals bought by the company with the soil, or for the argument that Lord Gerard would be a wrongdoer if, in properly working his works, he interfered by removal or otherwise with the clay or sand which the company has bought under the surface, when he would not be a wrong-doer if he interfered with the soil on the surface. The railway company can legally C acquire either surface or minerals for the purpose of their undertaking, and for that purpose only; and the scheme of these statutory provisions appears to us clearly to be that the owner of any subjacent mineral, not purchased by the company, may lawfully get his minerals by proper working, whatever else the company may have bought, subject only to the due protection of the works of the undertaking; and if, and so far as, such due protection prevents his getting D his minerals or renders it more costly, he is to be compensated when the time for working under or near the railway works arrives, and not before."

I entirely agree with that statement of the law. I am of opinion, therefore, that this claim is premature, and that the appellant is not entitled to have any compensation at present assessed in respect of the coal. The appeal fails, and must be E dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is: What is the law applicable to the case—whether the case is outside the operation of ss. 77-85 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and compensation is to be assessed according to the rules of the common law when the surface of land and the subjacent
F strata are severed.

In my judgment that question was determined long ago by the House of Lords in Great Western Rail. Co. v. Bennett (2), where LORD CRANWORTH says (L.R. 2 H.L. at p. 40):

G "It was obviously the intention of the legislature, in making these provisions, to create a new code as to the relation between mine owners and railway companies, where lands were compulsorily taken for the purpose of making a railway. The object of the statute evidently was to get rid of all the ordinary law on the subject, and to compel the owner to sell the surface, and if any mines were so near the surface that they must be taken for the purposes of the railway, to compel him to sell them, but not to compel him to sell anything more. The land was to be dealt with just as if there were no mines to be
I considered, nothing but the surface."

That passage was cited and adopted in Midland Rail. Co. and Kettering, Thrapston and Huntingdon Rail. Co. v. Robinson (3). It is to be observed that LORD CRAN-WORTH used the word "surface"; but that word was used as a convenient phrase to describe not only the top crust of the land, but also all that part of the land
I which does not consist of minerals or of minerals expressly sold to the railway company. We ought, therefore, to read into that passage, in substitution for the phrase "surface," the phrase "land taken by the railway company." Therefore, we may exclude altogether those common law rules which would be applicable if the land had been bought by agreement. It has been argued that, although the words of ss. 77-85 are plain, yet injustice would be done if their meaning were not cut down so as to introduce exceptions, and the sections so construed as not to apply when some only of the minerals are taken and others left. It is said that the statute was not intended to give rights which would not previously have existed.

I think that it did; for instance, it took away a right which the mineowner had at common law by preventing him from working minerals within forty yards of the railway. He is very seriously affected, for he cannot work such minerals or minerals under the railway without giving notice to the railway company.

Then it is said that the owner cannot derogate from his grant by going through the land; which has been actually sold to the railway company, in order to work his minerals. That seemed to be a plausible argument until the common law rights of the owners of minerals are considered. If the surface and the minerals are severed by agreement, the law implies a right to go through the surface to get at the minerals, if necessary, or to go laterally through something which may not be a mine. There is, therefore, no injustice to the owner in the present case, for he will still have that right. These sections of the Act form a complete code, substituted for the common law rights and liabilities of the parties; and these sections are the only directions which we have to consider. No compensation can be claimed in respect of minerals which are left until the time for working such minerals arrives. Ample provision is made for the compensation of the mine-owner. Then, and not until then, the claim for compensation arises. This appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Husband and Wife—Debts—Husband's debts—Wife's property charged to pay debts—Right to have property exonerated from charge—Consideration of all circumstances—Application of doctrine to charges created by court.

Where a married woman charges her property with money for the purpose of paying her husband's debts and the money raised by her is so applied, she is prima facie regarded in equity, and as between herself and him, as lending him, and not giving him, the money raised on her property, and as entitled to have her property exonerated by him from the charge she has created. This doctrine is purely equitable and the authorities which establish it plainly show that it is based on an inference to be drawn from all the circumstances of each particular case, the prima facie inference in such a case being that both parties intended that the wife's assistance should be limited to the necessity of the case and should not go beyond it. To say that in all such cases there is a presumption in favour of the wife and that it is for the husband to rebut it is to go too far and to use language calculated to mislead. The circumstances of each case must all be weighed in order to see what inference ought to be drawn, and until an inference in favour of the wife arises there is no presumption for the husband to rebut. Even where the wife charges her property with money to pay her husband's debts incurred without reference to her, there may be circumstances which prevent any inference from arising in her favour. The

A doctrine is applicable to charges created, not by a wife, but by an order of the court: see s. 169 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, as amended by the Married Women (Restraint upon Anticipation) Act, 1949 [see note infra], replacing s. 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

B Notes. Section 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which is set out at p. 1154 post, has been replaced by s. 169 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (20 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 429), which as amended by the Married Women (Restraint upon Anticipation) Act, 1949 (ibid. vol. 28, p. 733) (see Sched. 2) provides: "Where a married woman, in respect of any property or interest in property belonging to her, is by law unable to dispose of or bind such property or her interest therein [the present is the case of the mortgage of a life interest] . . . the court may, if it thinks fit, where it appears to the court to be for her benefit, by judgment or order, with her consent, bind her interest in such property." Restraints on anticipation or alienation attaching to the enjoyment of property by a woman were abolished by the Act of 1949 mentioned above.

I Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., in an action by Mrs. Lucy Annie Emily Paget against her husband, Gerald Cecil Stewart Paget, in which the plaintiff claimed a declaration of the liability of Mr. Paget to indemnify her and her separate estate in respect of mortgages, made by her in 1882 and 1887 under orders of the court binding her life interest in certain funds, and the sums of money paid or applied by her out of her separate estate in satisfaction of the debts and liabilities of the husband, or otherwise on his account, with interest. KEKEWICH, J., dismissed the action on the ground that, where the wife's life interest had been made available for raising money for payment of her husband's debts by means of relief from the restraint on anticipation under the sanction of the court, it was inconceivable that she intended, or that the court intended, that she should have a remedy against him not reserved (as in the present case) by the order giving such sanction, or that a doctrine flowing from the relations of husband and wife, and called into operation by her action independently of the court, should be thus extended. From that decision the wife appealed.

Mar. 24, 1898. SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., read the following judgment of the court.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff, Mrs. Paget, against a judgment of KEKEWICH, J., dismissing an action brought by her against the defendant, her husband. The object of the action was to obtain a declaration that the plaintiff's husband was liable to indemnify her against two charges for £23,000 and £22,000 created by her on her separate property for the payment of his debts.

Mr. and Mrs. Paget were married in January, 1877. The husband was entitled to some reversionary property. His interest in this property was settled on the marriage, but the property produced no income to him. The wife was a lady of fortune, and the bulk of her property was settled on her for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation. The sum of £2,000 a year derived from her property was, however, settled on her husband for life, but so that, if he attempted to alienate it, or if he became bankrupt, this annuity became payable to his wife. The husband and wife moved in good society, and, large as their income was, they lived far beyond it. So recklessly extravagant were they that five years after their marriage £23,000 was sorely needed to relieve them from the pressure of debts for which the husband was legally liable, but which had been contracted to defray the expenses of the extravagant mode of living which they both apparently enjoyed.

The affidavits filed in support of the plaintiff's application in June, 1882, for the order to which we will refer presently, leave no doubt, in our minds, that these debts had been contracted, not for purposes of the husband with which the wife had little to do, but in order to enable them both to live in the style they both thought suitable, and perhaps necessary, to enable them to maintain and enjoy that high social position which they both so greatly desired. We attach more importance to what the wife said in these affidavits than we do to what she said some fifteen years later when examined in this action, and when she was endeavouring to support her present claim. In the affidavits sworn by her and her solicitor in 1882 there is nothing to lead to the inference that any of the debts which then had to be met were incurred by her husband for purposes of his own as distinguished from the purposes of himself and his wife. In her affidavit of June, 1882, the plaintiff referred to the debts as contracted by her husband and herself as "our debts." It is true she said that until 1880 her attention was not called to the fact that she and her husband were getting into difficulties; but her affidavit shows that after she knew of those difficulties all that she really cared about was to increase the net income of herself and her husband, and to maintain their position in society. Her solicitor's affidavit leads to the same conclusion.

On June 28, 1882, the plaintiff applied for and obtained an order under s. 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 [repealed], enabling her to mortgage her life interest to secure £23,000 and interest and the premiums of a policy on her life. We do not think it necessary to refer in detail to the arrangements made for raising this sum, nor to its application when raised. It is sufficient to say that the money was raised as authorised by the order, and except as to £3,600 was applied in paying the debts intended to be paid off by its means. The £3,600 not so applied was misappropriated by the solicitor who raised the money. Five years afterwards another sum of £22,000 was wanted for similar purposes. Another application was made to the court, supported by further affidavits by the plaintiff and her then solicitor, and on Aug. 11, 1887, another order was made enabling the plaintiff to mortgage her life interest for £22,000 and interest and for the premiums on another policy. This sum was accordingly raised and applied as authorised by the order. The plaintiff's affidavit filed on this occasion, July 28, 1887, referred to what had been done in 1882, and to the misappropriation of £3,600, and to the fact that debts had been contracted to pay off the creditors who ought to have been paid off with that sum, and to the impossibility of avoiding bankruptcy and loss of social position if the arrangements then contemplated were not carried out. The plaintiff stated her desire to raise this sum of £22,000, and she spoke of the debts as "our debts" as she had done in 1882. She represented the debts to be hers quite as much as her husband's, and she treated his income and hers as one which it was desirable to maintain as far as possible.

These transactions of 1882 and 1887 having been completed, the question arises whether Mrs. Paget is entitled to be indemnified by her husband against these sums of £23,000 and £22,000 when called in, and in the meantime against the interest and premiums charged on her life interest by the above orders. The fact that the plaintiff and her husband were separated in 1893 explains how this controversy has arisen, but does not, in our opinion, affect the question of law which has to be considered. The plaintiff's rights, whatever they are, were not created in 1893, but arose in 1882 and 1887, although she might not care to enforce them while she and her husband lived happily together. What, then, were her rights in 1882 and 1887? In this action she has given evidence, and has stated that nothing was ever said about her giving anything to her husband, that he managed all her affairs and she did not understand them and did not want to do so, that in making her former affidavit in 1882 she ought not to have used such expressions as "our debts" and "my debts," that she herself was not living beyond her income, and that some of the debts which had to be paid were not for money spent for her and her husband's joint benefit. But when pressed on this point it seems tolerably plain that there is no reason for saying that the statement contained in her affidavit of 1882 did not disclose the true state of things and ought not now to be believed, although she evidently wishes to minimise the effect of it. What she now says, however, is that all she knew was that her husband was in danger of being made bankrupt and that she wished to save him from such a disaster. Her attempt to dissociate herself from her husband's racing debts was not successful. As regards the transaction of 1887, she admitted that the financial situation which needed treatment then was very much the same as in 1882 and arose from the same cause. She also stated that in 1887 her husband was in America, and that CHITTY, J., who made both orders, saw her in his private room, and was told by her how these new difficulties had arisen, what the debts were, what the money was wanted for, and so on. The learned judge was, no doubt, greatly influenced on both occasions by her own statements as to her own indebtedness.

Bearing in mind this evidence we have to consider the effect in equity of the transactions in 1882 and 1887, to which we have alluded. The authorities bearing on the subject, beginning with Earl of Huntington v. Countess of Huntington (1), and coming down to Hudson v. Carmichael (2), show that, if a married woman charges her property with money for the purpose of paying her husband's debts and the money raised by her is so applied, she is prima facie regarded in equity, and as between herself and him, as lending him, and not giving him, the money raised on her property, and as entitled to have her property exonerated by him from the charge she has created. This doctrine is purely equitable, and the authorities which establish it show that it is based on an inference to be drawn from the circumstances of each particular case, the prima facie inference being in such a case as that supposed that both parties intended that the wife's assistance should be limited to the necessity of the case and should not go beyond such necessity. But even where the wife charges her property with money to pay her husband's debts incurred without reference to her, there may be circumstances which prevent any inference from arising in her favour. Thus, if a settlement is made by the husband on his wife at the time she charges her estate, he is regarded as purchasing her assistance, and the inference that the parties intended that the wife's property should be exonerated by the husband does not arise: see Lewis v. Nangle (3). Clinton v. Hooper (4) is the leading authority to show that the doctrine in question is based on an inference to be drawn in each case from all the facts of that particular case.

It was long ago settled that, although under the old law a husband became liable for the antenuptial debts of his wife, she had no right in equity to compel him to exonerate property of hers charged with those debts, even although he had expressly covenanted to pay them: see Lewis v. Nangle (3); and Earl of Kinnoul v. Money (5). This shows the importance of ascertaining, and of not confounding, the wife's debts with the husband's debts when considering such cases as those to which I am alluding. To say that in all such cases there is a presumption in favour of the wife, and that it is for the husband to rebut it, is, in our opinion, to go too far and to use language calculated to mislead. The circumstances of each case must all be weighed in order to see what inference ought to be drawn; and until an inference in favour of the wife arises there is no presumption for the husband to rebut. If this is forgotten error may creep in.

The circumstances of the present case we take to be those disclosed by the plaintiff in her affidavits, especially her representations of her own indebtedness, as well as of her husband's, and we will add to these her recent statement that nothing was ever said about giving anything to her husband. Neither was anything said about lending him anything. She had a large income, and, although restrained from anticipation, she might have accrued income in respect of which she could contract debts. There is no reason to suppose that she had no debts and could contract none. She represented herself as pressed by her creditors, and we see no reason to doubt the truth of her statements. The plaintiff was as extravagant and reckless as her husband, and was quite as desirous as he of maintaining her position in society. This object, so dear to both of them, might have been entirely frustrated if she had the right against him which she now asserts. That right would, in point of law, have been her separate estate, and she might under pressure have assigned it, and her assignee might have enforced it against her husband whether she liked it or not. She had plenty of debts enforceable against any separate estate she had or might have besides income which she could not anticipate. Those circumstances, and the peculiar position of her husband with respect to his £2,000 a year, lead us to the conclusion that no inference ought in this case to be drawn in her favour of any right to be indemnified by her husband.

This conclusion is arrived at apart from the orders of the court, to which KEKEWICH, J., attached so much importance, and the effect of which we will now consider. They are based on s. 39 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which provided:

“Notwithstanding that a married woman is restrained from anticipation [as to which see note, p. 1151, ante], the court may, if it thinks fit, where it appears to the court to be for her benefit, by judgment or order, with her consent, bind her interest in any property.”

Unless the wording of the section is attended to, there is danger of regarding the section as merely authorising the court to remove the restraint against alienation which is so frequently imposed on married women when property is settled on them for their separate use. But it is to be observed that what binds the estate of a married woman is not what she does when the restraint is removed, but the order made by the court. The language of the section is that the court may, by judgment or order, bind her interest. The court is empowered to do this where it appears to the court for her benefit so to do, and with her consent. A question at once arises whether the doctrine which is applicable to charges created by a wife to pay her husband's debts is to be applied to charges created, not by her, but by an order of the court. The learned judge in the court below has held that the doctrine in question has no application to such a case, and that where orders are obtained under that section charging her property with money to be applied in paying her husband's debts, the order should show on the face of it that her husband is to be liable to indemnify her if he is to be under any such liability.

It certainly might be convenient if such orders were so drawn as to show what was intended in this respect. But these orders are usually made without hearing the husband, and we are not prepared to say, as a matter of law, that an order silent as to the wife's rights against her husband is fatal to the existence of such rights. The circumstances under which the order was made might show that a right on her part to be indemnified by her husband ought to be inferred, although the order did not allude to it. The absence of all allusion to such right is, however, a circumstance to be considered, and in this particular case the form of the orders of 1882 and 1887 tells against the plaintiff when regard is had to the statements made by her in order to obtain them. It was urged that it could not be for her benefit that she should be deprived of her right to indemnity, but the force of this observation depends on the tacit assumption that she had the right. The question comes back to the proper inference to be drawn from all the facts including the orders themselves. And, bearing in mind that the plaintiff's paramount object was to save her and her husband's joint income, and thus, as far as possible, to preserve her and his position in society, and that this object might have been defeated if she reserved a right to be indemnified by him, the proper inference to be drawn is, in our opinion, adverse to the evidence of such right. In our opinion, therefore, the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

There cannot be desertion unless there is cohabitation which is broken by the act of desertion, but the necessary cohabitation does not require that the spouses must be physically living under the same roof.

A married female domestic servant, who never lived with her husband under the same roof, was visited from time to time by him at her employer's house, and had a child by him. The husband refused to receive her boxes into the house where he lived, or to give her any help towards her maintenance.

Held: the cohabitation was sufficient to give jurisdiction to the justices to make an order under s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 [now s. 1 of the Matrimonial Proceedings (Magistrates' Courts) Act, 1960].

Notes. The Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, was repealed by the Matrimonial Proceedings (Magistrates' Courts) Act, 1960, s. 1 of which corresponds to s. 4 of the Act of 1895.

Appeal by Ellen Bradshaw, a domestic servant, from the decision of justices sitting at Richmond, Surrey, who had dismissed a summons taken out by her under s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

The deposition of the wife, Ellen Bradshaw, was to the effect that she was married to the husband, Richard Lonsdale Bradshaw, at the Register Office, Brentford, on Dec. 18, 1893; and, being pregnant at the time, she went to reside with her friends, and was subsequently confined at Queen Charlotte's Lying-in Hospital. She saw the husband, and told him the child was ill, and subsequently wrote to him again, informing him of the child's death. He made some excuse and said he could allow her nothing. The wife had to sell and pledge her things to pay the expenses of the child's burial. Prior to the marriage she had been in service, and she took another situation after her child died, and allowed the husband to visit her and occasionally pass part of the night with her, the result being that a second child was born in the hospital on July 19, 1895. The husband refused to go and see the child, although made aware of the fact that it was dying, and again the wife had to defray the funeral expenses. The husband had told her that if her boxes were sent to the house where he was living they would be returned.

The husband, who was called by the wife's solicitor, admitted the truth of her evidence. He said he was thirty years of age and assisted his father in his trade as a bootmaker. He was also a bit of an artist, but had only sold one picture. He was willing he said to maintain his wife, but he had no means. At the conclusion of the evidence the magistrates held that they had no jurisdiction, on the ground that there was not an existing state of cohabitation, and that, without this, there could be no desertion. The wife appealed.

Lynch for the husband.

SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P.—The only question in this case is one of jurisdiction. The magistrates have held that they had none, and they so held upon the authority of the two cases of Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (1) and R. v. Leresche (2). I think there is very often some misunderstanding as to what the meaning and authority of those two cases really is. It is perfectly true that there cannot be desertion unless there is a cohabitation which is broken by the act of desertion. But cohabitation does not necessarily imply—and is not meant by those cases to imply—that the parties must be physically living under the same roof. If that were indeed so, there would be a great number of persons, such, for instance, as domestic servants, who might be said never to cohabit, and who cannot live all day and all night under the same roof. The two authorities cited have this feature in common, and it is the

A guiding feature in both of them: the parties in each case were living separate and apart from each other by mutual consent, and were not cohabiting in any sense of the word; and, of course, under such circumstances there could not be desertion without a previous resumption of cohabitation. In the present case, however, there does seem to have been cohabitation, because there were two children, and it would appear that the husband afterwards ceased to allow his wife anything, and refused even to receive her boxes: in point of fact, he refused to have anything more to do with her. It may, therefore, be that he has deserted her. At any rate, the fact that the parties were not living under the same roof does not imply that the magistrates had no jurisdiction to entertain the case. In my opinion, therefore, it must be remitted to them, in order that they may hear and determine it upon its merits.

C GORELL BARNES, J. I am of the same opinion. I think that the magistrates made no order because they did not appreciate the two authorities cited.

Bankruptcy—Notice—"Final judgment"—Judgment in action on order for payment of costs—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict., c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).

G An action by the debtor against the creditor was dismissed as frivolous and vexatious and the debtor's appeal was dismissed with costs. The creditor brought an action against the debtor claiming the sum due under the order for costs, and he obtained judgment by default. The creditor then served a bankruptcy notice on the debtor in respect of the judgment.

H Held: an action might be brought to recover costs payable under an order of the court and the judgment obtained by the creditor in such an action was a "final judgment" within s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now s. 1 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914], on which a bankruptcy notice might be served on the debtor.

I Notes. Section 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, has been repealed and is replaced by s. 1 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, see 2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 325.

Appeal by the creditor from an order of Registrar GIFFARD setting aside a bankruptcy notice. Acting on a doubt expressed by CAVE, J., in Re Shirley, Ex parte Mackay (1) the registrar held that a "final judgment" within the meaning of s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, could not be obtained by bringing an action on an order of the court for payment of costs, and set aside the bankruptcy notice on the debtor's application.

The debtor had previously brought an action against the creditor, which had been dismissed as frivolous and vexatious, and an appeal by him from this order to the Court of Appeal had been dismissed with costs. The creditor, finding a difficulty in enforcing the order for the payment of costs, commenced an action against the debtor in the Queen's Bench Division, claiming the amount of the costs due under the order. The debtor did not appear and the creditor signed judgment by default. The creditor then served on the debtor a bankruptcy notice under s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, requiring the debtor to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Pollard for the creditor.—The creditor has obtained "final judgment" within the meaning of s. 4 (1) (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. An action may be brought to recover costs payable under a judge's order: (Philpott v. Lehain). The judgment is regular in form and the registrar has no power to go behind the judgment on which the notice is founded. All that he can consider is whether the creditor has complied with the conditions imposed by s. 4 (1) (g). If it is clearly upon its face not a final judgment, as was the case in Re Binstead, Ex parte Dale, the registrar may go behind it to see what it really is. But he cannot do so if it is in form a regular final judgment. The only reasons he can entertain are those specified in s. 4 (1) (g): (Re Easton, Ex parte Dixon). The dictum of CAVE, J., in Re Shirley, Ex parte Mackay (1) (58. L.T. at p. 238), upon which the registrar acted here, was wrong, and should be overruled.

Turrell for the debtor.—In form this is a final judgment, but the dictum of CAVE, J., was right, and the action could not be brought on the order. The registrar had power to go behind the judgment.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—The debtor in this case had been ordered by the Court of Appeal to pay the costs of his appeal to that court. The creditor, who had been the respondent in that appeal, commenced an action by writ of summons against the debtor claiming the amount of costs payable under the order of the Court of Appeal. In my opinion, he had a perfect right to do that. The writ was served, and the defendant did not appear. He had, as is admitted, no defence to the action. The plaintiff then signed judgment for default of appearance. That was a valid judgment against the defendant which cannot be questioned except in bankruptcy. The plaintiff's next step was to serve a bankruptcy notice on the defendant claiming the amount due under the judgment. The defendant did not comply with the requirements of the notice, and thereby committed an act of bankruptcy upon which a receiving order could be made against him. Upon hearing a bankruptcy petition, the court can go behind a judgment and consider whether it can be supported, but in this case the registrar cannot do otherwise than find that there was a debt, and

A therefore the debtor cannot escape being made bankrupt. I am quite prepared to say that I cannot agree with the dictum of CAVE, J., in Re Shirley, Ex parte Mackay (1), and that it must be overruled. The appeal must be allowed.

B LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I concur in what the Master of the Rolls has said as to the dictum of CAVE, J., in Re Shirley, Ex parte Mackay (1).

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

I Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD ESHER, M.R., LOPES and DAVEY, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of the Divisional Court (WILLS and WRIGHT, JJ.) on a Special Case.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the speech of LORD WATSON.

On Sept. 30, 1891, the firm of Bean and Gough, consisting of two partners, was dissolved by mutual consent on the terms that Gough should continue the business, and should, in consideration of his being permitted to take over the bulk of its assets, relieve the retiring partner of the whole liabilities of the firm. Some time before the date of the dissolution the respondent, one Morton, had a meeting with the two partners, at which he consented, in the event of the dissolution taking place, to assist Gough towards carrying on the business. He accordingly continued to deal with Gough, who traded under the name of C. H. Gough & Co., until the concern became bankrupt in July, 1892. At the time of its dissolution the old firm owed a considerable sum to the respondent. The appellant, one Burgess, who was trustee in the bankruptcy of C. H. Gough & Co., in December, 1892, brought this action against the respondent for recovery of £1,067 10s. 10d. as the balance due on his transactions with the bankrupt. The respondent resisted the claim, mainly on the ground that he was entitled to set off against that balance the sum due to him by the old firm. The cause was set down for trial at York before LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., when, there being no likelihood of its being reached, the parties, with the consent of the learned judge, agreed to withdraw it from trial, and to state a Special Case for the decision of the court.

In the Special Case the only matter which was professedly submitted for adjudication was the respondents contention to the effect that "he is entitled to set off the moneys owing to him from the firm of Bean and Gough, at the date of the said dissolution of partnership, against the sum claimed on the writ." The Case concluded by stating the agreement of the parties that, in the event of the contention being sustained, judgment should be entered for the respondent, with costs, and that it should be declared that he was entitled to prove against the bankrupt estate for £62, and that, in the event of its being rejected, judgment should be entered for the appellant for the sum of £836 11s., with costs. The circumstances detailed in the Case were not calculated, and were not intended, to raise any question of law. There had been no dispute between the parties in regard to the law of set-off, and, in the argument in the appeal, neither party attempted to conceal that the only point upon which they desired a decision was whether the statements in the Case did or did not warrant the inference that the respondent had, before the bankruptcy of Gough, made an agreement which would entitle him to a set-off. No particular agreement was stated or put in issue.

The Case was first submitted to a Divisional Court, composed of WILLS and WRIGHT, JJ., who pointed out the incompetency and inexpediency of trying such a question by means of a Special Case, but expressed their willingness to do the best they could to decide it if the parties desired them to do so. On that footing they heard the case, and gave judgment for the present appellant on the ground that the facts and circumstances stated were insufficient to warrant an inference that the respondent had made any agreement which could support his plea of set-off. Their decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Dec. 16, 1895. The following opinions were read.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case an effort has been made to try in the form of a Special Case a pure question of fact and to make it subject to the ordinary consequences of being subject to appeal first to the Court of Appeal and then to your Lordships' House. Speaking for myself, I will not be a party to such a course of procedure. It is objectionable in two ways. It is objectionable to ask your Lordships to try a question of fact without the facts themselves being put before you. It is objectionable as a matter of procedure because the legislature have provided a mode of deciding questions of law when the parties are practically agreed upon the facts. But this is an effort to use that convenient method of trying a question of law and agreeing to what is called a Special Case, when it by agreement between the parties does not state either the inferences of fact, or even all the facts from which the inferences of fact are to be drawn.

A It has been candidly admitted by counsel at the Bar how this occurred. The parties could not agree upon the facts—in particular as to what had passed at a conversation between the parties, which conversation terminating in an agreement would have been decisive one way or another upon the question which your Lordships are asked to determine now. Because the parties could not agree how the fact was, they agreed upon a Special Case from which this matter is left out
B altogether, this intentional omission including the disputed parts of the conversation as to an agreement, and they ask first the court below and now your Lordships to grope in the dark as best one can to find out what was the real effect of the agreement between the parties which the parties themselves have deliberately withheld because they could not agree upon what passed between them. I think that this is a complete perversion of the procedure provided by the statute. When the case came
C before the Divisional Court it was immediately observed by the judges that this was not properly a Special Case, and both by counsel and the judges it was treated as being left to the judges not as a Special Case raising a question of law, but upon the invitation of counsel the judges agreed to hear it and to decide it as a question of fact. After the judgment was given both judges, on an application to stay, interposed with the observation that it having been left to them to decide as a question
D of fact they could not see how there could be any appeal. Both judges were agreed that there was no point of law, indeed, that could not have been disputed before your Lordships.

I am, therefore, of opinion that there is no appeal. The judges were invited to sit practically as arbitrators, and their decision upon the question in dispute, which is one of fact, I regard as final. In saying that, I have not omitted to observe
E that the Special Case allows the right to draw inferences of fact—which is a very well-understood provision. Occasionally it will happen that upon the facts as agreed upon some point is left uncovered, and in order to prevent the necessity of going back to the arbitrators or tribunal of fact that provision is inserted to enable the court upon the question of law raised to draw such inferences of fact as may not be specifically found. But the objection here is that no question of law is
F raised or intended to be raised, but a question of fact only, and the Divisional Court only heard it upon the understanding that they were arbitrators between the parties. It has been held in this House that where, with the acquiescence of both parties, the judge departs from the ordinary course of procedure, and, as in this case, decides upon the question of fact, it is incompetent for the parties afterwards to assume that they have then an alternative mode of procedure, and to treat the matter as if
G they had been heard in due course. I am satisfied that, if the parties had not agreed to take the decision of the Divisional Court as being one on a question of fact, that court would have refused to hear the case. The parties having done so, I think that they are precluded now from treating the matter as subject to appeal, and I think, therefore, that this appeal must succeed upon the ground that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to entertain the question. For these reasons it becomes un-
H necessary to consider what would have been the proper decision, and I accordingly move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, and that the original judgment of the Divisional Court be restored, the respondents to pay the appellant the costs here and below.

I LORD WATSON.—Before dealing with the points which require to be considered in this appeal, it is necessary to notice the circumstances giving rise to the action, and also the peculiar course of procedure which has been taken. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:] The opinions delivered by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal deal exclusively with the question of fact upon which alone their decision was heard. But the present appellant objected to their competency to interfere with the judgment of the Divisional Court, which he maintained to be conclusive. The objection was, however, overruled. LORD ESHER, M.R., after adverting to the terms of the Special Case, said :

“Whether it is necessary in these circumstances that a question of law should be raised, is a matter which it seems to me it is not necessary to decide in this case, because I cannot have a doubt but that there were some difficult questions of law raised in this case, as well as inferences of fact which were to be drawn, so that it is a Special Case under the ordinary circumstances of a Special Case, with power for the court to draw inferences of fact.”

I am unable to assent to the view thus stated by LORD ESHER. It does not appear to me to admit of doubt that the judgment of the Divisional Court was substantially a consent order. I am also satisfied that the whole proceedings in the cause, from and after the time when the parties thought fit to retire from the proper tribunal for its trial, have been extra cursum curiæ. The rules which govern procedure on the common law side of the High Court of Justice do not contemplate or permit the use of a Special Case, except for the purpose of obtaining the decision of questions of law arising upon facts which are admitted; and the consent of a judge to its use for the purpose of trying a question of fact cannot, although the fact when found might give rise to legal questions, make it a regular proceeding in the ordinary course of law. I think the consent of the judge in this case must be presumed to have been given on the assumption that the parties meant to raise directly some question of law, although it now appears that they had no such intention.

There are several decisions of this House in cases coming from Scotland which appear to me to affirm that the judgment of a court below, pronounced extra cursum curiæ, is in the nature of an arbiter's award, and that, as a general rule at least, no appeal from it will lie. An appeal was held on that ground to be incompetent in Craig v. Duffus (1), Dudgeon v. Thomson (2), and Renfrew (Provost) v. Hoby (3). All these cases had the following features in common: (i) The action had been remitted to the jury court by an interlocutor which was not subject to review; (ii) the parties had agreed, either before the trial commenced, or before the jury were asked to consider their verdict, to withdraw the action from trial by jury, and to accept the decision of the court, in one instance upon a proof to be taken by commission, and in the others upon the notes of the presiding judge and the productions made before him; and (iii) the court referred to was a Division of the Court of Session, so that the appeal was against the first and only decision which had been given upon the evidence. I may add that all of these cases involved questions of law arising upon the facts when these were ascertained.

The subsequent decision of the House in Bickett v. Morris (4) does not trench upon the authority of these precedents, although it establishes an exception in cases where the party holding the original judgment has stated no objection to an appeal from it to an intermediate court. In that case the action was one of the causes specially appropriated for trial by jury under the provisions of the Scottish Judicature Act of 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 120). While it depended before the Lord Ordinary, and before the usual order was made remitting it to the jury court, the parties agreed that it should be disposed of by the court upon a proof by commission. The proof was taken, and was reported to the Lord Ordinary, who, after hearing parties, assolizied the defender. The pursuers then presented a reclaiming note, to the competency of which no objection was stated; and the Second Division recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and gave judgment for the pursuers. The defender brought an appeal to this House against the decision of the Second Division, and was met by a preliminary plea of incompetency. After hearing a full argument upon the point LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., LORD CRANWORTH and LORD WESTBURY unanimously repelled the plea, heard the appeal upon its merits, and affirmed the judgment appealed from. The Lord Chancellor said:

“By taking the step of appealing to the Inner House, the pursuers, in my opinion, have precluded themselves from objecting that the interlocutor pronounced in their favour is not subject to all the consequences of other interlocutors, and therefore is appealable to this House.”

A LORD WESTBURY observed :

“Upon the question of competency it must be understood that the decision of your Lordships proceeds upon its being personally incompetent to the respondents to raise that objection.”

B In my opinion it necessarily follows from the rule laid down by the House in these cases that the Court of Appeal were incompetent to entertain the respondent's appeal to them, unless the appellant unreservedly submitted the determination of the Special Case upon its merits to their jurisdiction. So far from acquiescing in, he objected to the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal, and there can, therefore, be no reason for holding, as in Bickett v. Morris (4), that he is personally barred from now pleading the absolute finality of the judgment of the Divisional Court. In my
C opinion the House has, in these circumstances, no jurisdiction except to reverse as incompetent the judgment of the Court of Appeal. I, therefore, concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD SHAND stated the facts and continued : Where a question of law arises on facts agreed on, or on alternative views of facts, the question admits of being
D distinctly stated, and it is usual and desirable that it should be so stated expressly. In the present case not only does the Special Case state no such question, but counsel did not suggest that any such question admitted of being formulated. It is true that the Case contains the clause usually inserted where questions of law are presented for decision, viz., “The court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.” But, on examination, if it turns out, as here, that the only duty which it is
E sought to throw on the court is to draw inferences from which certain legal consequences admittedly follow, this only shows that the question for decision is one of fact only. This being so, I am of opinion with your Lordships that the Case was one which the Divisional Court was not bound to entertain. As soon as it became apparent to the judges of that court—and this seems to have been at an early stage of the argument—that the Special Case raised only a question of fact for their deter-
F mination, they would have been warranted in declining to give judgment on it; and with a Special Case which left so much to conjecture, and where the parol evidence of the parties would have, in many respects, supplied satisfactory grounds for decision one way or the other, in place of mere grounds for speculation as to what the parties meant, and said, and did, it is not unlikely that the ends of justice would have been better served had this course been taken. It is apparent
G that the judges yielded to the entreaties of both parties in entertaining and disposing of the Case, and I agree in thinking that the proceeding was extra cursum curiæ, and that the decision of the dispute between the parties was of the nature of an award by arbiters, as indeed the judges of the Divisional Court seem themselves to have thought. It follows, on the authority of the series of cases cited by H LORD WATSON, that, as the plaintiff maintained the finality of the decision of the Divisional Court in the Court of Appeal, their Lordships, in place of dealing with the merits of the cause, should have sustained that contention and held that the proceedings and decision having been extra cursum curiæ, they could not entertain the appeal. On these grounds I agree in thinking that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that of the Divisional Court restored.

Mistake—Mistake of fact—Money paid under mistake—Action for recovery—Estoppel—Representation by plaintiffs that money properly payable.

A., the endorsee of a bill of exchange, resident abroad, endorsed it to the defendants, his agents in London, for the purpose of collection. The defendants endorsed the bill to the plaintiffs and sent it to them for collection, and they forwarded it to their agents. The plaintiffs, under a misunderstanding, informed the defendants that the bill had been paid, and sent them a cheque for the amount. The defendants intimated the same to A., and credited him with the amount of the bill. The bill not having been met, the plaintiffs sought to recover the amount paid.

Held: the plaintiffs could not recover the amount of the bill from the defendants as (i) the defendants had had nothing to do with the mistake of fact under which the bill had been paid, and (ii) the plaintiffs were estopped by the representation which they had made to the defendants, and upon which the defendants had acted.

MATHEW, J.—This case was tried before me upon the facts as appearing from the correspondence which was put in, and it gives rise to a question of some importance. The facts were these: A gentleman of the name of Benatar, carrying on business in Morocco, sold to a firm of Pierard & Co., of Antwerp, a quantity of canary seed, and in payment he received from Pierard & Co. a bill of a somewhat unusual kind. It was a bill drawn by Pierard & Co. on themselves, and accepted by them, and endorsed to Benatar. Benatar forwarded this instrument to the defendants, his correspondents in London. They endorsed it to the plaintiffs, for the purpose of collection only. The defendants apparently had considerable doubts and anxiety about the bill, and they handed it to the plaintiffs to collect, with

A the direction that they (the defendants) were to be informed whether the bill was met or not, and that no expense should be incurred in case it was not met. That was a sufficient intimation, and a protest would not be necessary, because notice of dishonour would be of no importance. Clearly as between Benatar and the defendants there was no discount of the bill—no transfer of the bill for any consideration other than for the purpose of collection. Therefore, in the event of B its dishonour no notice would be necessary. The plaintiffs sent the bill on Jan. 24, 1895, to their agents at Antwerp, and in their letter they asked their agents to advise specially of the payment of the bill. They did not intimate, and one can understand why, that it was not desired that any expense should be incurred of a protest.

C On Jan. 26 the Antwerp agents wrote to the plaintiffs, and the form of the letter gave rise to the mistake which subsequently occurred. In that advice the plaintiffs were informed that they were credited with the amount of the bill as from Feb. 4, the intention being that if the bill were not paid on Feb. 4 they should be debited with the amount. But this intimation appears to have been misunderstood, and to have been treated as an intimation that the bill was met. On Feb. 4 it was then D recorded by the clerk of the plaintiffs that the bill had been collected. On that day the defendants called to inquire about the bill, and to their surprise, I cannot help thinking, were informed that the bill had been collected, and on the next day they received the amount from the plaintiffs. Upon their being informed that the bill had been met, they immediately telegraphed to their correspondent abroad, Benatar, and informed him that the bill had been collected. On the same day or the E next they wrote informing Benatar that the money had been received and had been credited to Benatar. On Feb. 8, without any further explanation from the Antwerp agents to the plaintiffs, the bill was returned duly protested and not paid, and on Feb. 9, the clerk of the plaintiffs called upon the defendants and demanded repayment of the amount that had been handed to them, on the ground that it had been paid under a mistake. On Feb. 11 the defendants telegraphed to Benatar F informing him, in a few words, of the condition of things, and on Feb. 15, Benatar telegraphed to the defendants, the result of the telegram being that Benatar refused to return the money. He said that the money had been collected, and he would not repay it. Those are the circumstances under which the action came before me. The plaintiffs persisted in their demand on the defendants for the repayment of the amount, and they brought their action. They brought their action first on the G bill as a dishonoured bill, of which they were indorsees, from the defendants, and in the alternative for money had and received—money paid under a mistake of fact. I have to decide whether that claim can be maintained or not. I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs cannot recover from the defendants the amount of the bill.

H In the course of the argument the attention of counsel was called by me to the well-known case of Skyring v. Greenwood (1) as an authority which probably would be decisive of the present case. It was alleged by the plaintiffs here that the money had been paid under a mistake of fact to the defendants, and it may be said that, if there was a mistake, it was a mistake with which they had nothing to do. The defendants employed the plaintiffs to collect the amount of the bill, and to inform them accurately as to whether the bill had been paid or not. Unfortunately the I plaintiffs, by the mistake of one of their servants, were guilty of a breach of duty towards the defendants. They failed to inform them accurately. They informed them of that which was not the fact, namely, that the money had been received, and they handed them the money. On what ground of law or of equity can they say that they can get rid of the consequences of their breach of duty because they had made a mistake? I am not aware of any such principle. The case to which I have referred is a clear illustration, as it seems to me, of the principle applicable to this litigation. In Skyring v. Greenwood (1) Cox & Co. the army agents had credited one of their customers with the amount of extra pay, to which amount of extra pay it appears he was not entitled, and Cox & Co. were informed that he was not entitled to it, but by inadvertence they failed to inform him on the subject, and failed to cease to credit him as they might have done with the amounts which previously it appeared he had been receiving. For four or five years they had gone on crediting him with the amount, and from time to time he had drawn the money and spent it. At the time of the customer's death there was a considerable sum standing to his credit, and his administratrix who sought to recover this amount, was met by an attempt on the part of Cox & Co. to set off payments that had been previously made, or with which he was credited, as payments made under a mistake of fact. It will be found on examining the case that the judges decided that the money could not be recovered, because the mistake was one with which the customer had nothing to do, and a mistake that arose from a breach of duty on the part of Cox & Co. towards him. On principle that case would appear to be distinctly applicable to the present case.

The same principle may be detected in two other cases, namely, Chambers v. Miller (2) and Pollard v. Bank of England (3). In the one case a bill, and in the other case a cheque, was paid under the impression that the customer had got assets in the hands of the banker to meet the respective documents. It turned out that there were no effects, and that the bank in each case need not have paid, and perhaps ought not to have paid the bill or the cheque. Although the attempt was made to correct the mistake immediately, in the case of the cheque the money had been handed over, and a person to whom it was handed over was engaged in counting the money. It was held that it could not be recovered back, because it had been paid to a person, under a mistake of fact no doubt, so far as the person paying it was concerned, but a mistake of fact with which it was held that the defendants in each case had nothing to do. On these grounds alone I should have thought that the defendants here were clearly entitled to succeed.

There is another ground on which I cannot conceive how it is possible for the plaintiffs to escape, and that is the ground of estoppel. Here the money was paid, and on the faith of that payment the correspondent abroad, Benatar, was credited in account. It seems to me on principle the same as if the money had been paid to him, or the money paid to some third person by his direction. The plaintiffs, if they recovered from the defendants, would leave the defendants in the position of having to get that money back, which they paid on the faith of the plaintiffs' statement to them. That they would have uncommonly little chance, as a matter of business, of ever recovering the money from Benatar, their correspondent in Morocco, is abundantly clear from the excellent argument of that gentleman, in the two letters of Feb. 15 and 22, 1895, where he said that, when he heard that he was credited in account with the amount, he paid for this very canary seed, relying upon the fact that that bill had been met, and credit had been given him. Of course, if Benatar succeeded in showing that—this correspondence is before me to act upon—the defendants would have no ground whatever for recovering from Benatar. An account had been stated between them and him upon the faith of this representation made by the plaintiffs to the defendants. On this ground of estoppel also, I conceive that the defendants are entitled to my judgment. I, therefore, give judgment for them, and with costs. The plaintiffs appealed.

Robson, Q.C., and F. M. Abrahams for the plaintiffs.

R. M. Bray and Clarke Williams for the defendants.

LINDLEY, A. L. SMITH and RIGBY, L.JJ., without considering that part of the judgment of MATHEW, J., which was based on the authorities, came to the conclusion that the view taken by him of the facts was right and dismissed the appeal with costs.

By the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 16 [see now s. 142 of the Licensing Act, 1953]:
“If any licensed person (1) knowingly harbours or knowingly suffers to remain on his premises any constable during any part of the time appointed for such constable being on duty . . . or (2) supplies any liquor or refreshment whether by way of gift or sale to any constable on duty unless by authority of some superior officer of such constable; or (3) bribes or attempts to bribe any constable . . . he shall be liable to a penalty.”

The appellant, a licensee of a public-house much frequented by police when off duty, was convicted under s. 16 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1872, of selling liquor to a constable while he was on duty. It was proved that the constable had removed his armlet, an indication that he was off duty, and the appellant had served him in the bona fide belief that that was the case.

Held: as the appellant had no intention of doing a wrongful act and had reasonable grounds for believing the constable to be off duty, the conviction must be quashed.

Per DAY, J.: The only effect of the appearance of the word “knowingly” in s. 16 (1) of the Act and its omission in sub-s. (2) is to shift the burden of proof. In cases under subs. (1) it is for the prosecution to prove knowledge, while in cases under sub-s. (2) it is for the defendant to prove that he did not know.

Notes. Section 16 of the Licensing Act, 1872, has been repealed. See now s. 142 of the Licensing Act, 1953 (33 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 270).

Case Stated by SIR PETER EDLIN, Q.C., chairman of quarter sessions for the County of London.

The appellant was licensee of a public-house, and was convicted before a metropolitan police magistrate under s. 16 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1872, for having unlawfully supplied liquor to a police constable on duty without having the authority of a superior officer of such constable for so doing. The appellant's public-house was situated nearly opposite a police-station and was much frequented by the police when off duty. On July 16, 1894, at about 4.40 p.m., the police constable in question, being then on duty, entered the appellant's house and was served with liquor by the appellant's daughter in his presence. Prior to entering the house the police constable had removed his armlet, and it was admitted that if a police constable is not wearing his armlet that is an indication that he is off duty. The armlet is removed at the police-station when a constable is dismissed, and a publican seeing the armlet off would naturally think the police constable to be off duty. The police constable was in the habit of using the appellant's house, and was well known to the appellant and his daughter. Neither the appellant nor his daughter made any inquiry of the police constable as to whether he was or was not on duty; but they took it for granted that he was off duty in consequence of his armlet being off, and served him with liquor being under that belief. The appellant and his daughter were in the habit of serving a number of police constables in uniform with their armlets off each day, and the question whether they were or were not off duty was never asked when the armlet was seen to be off, and he was served with liquor under that belief by the appellant's daughter. The appellant appealed to quarter sessions against the conviction of the magistrate, contending that, in order to constitute an offence under s. 16 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1872, G
H
I

A there must be shown to be either knowledge that the police constable was on duty or an intentional abstention from ascertaining whether he was on duty or not. The court of quarter sessions upheld the conviction, considering that knowledge that the police constable, when served with liquor, was on duty, was not an essential ingredient of the offence, but stated this Case for the opinion of the court.

C DAY, J.—I am clearly of opinion that this conviction ought to be quashed. A police constable comes into the house of the appellant without an armlet on, and therefore with the appearance of being off duty. The appellant's house was in the immediate neighbourhood of the police-station, and the appellant believed, and he had very natural ground for believing, that the constable was off duty. Acting on that belief he accordingly served him with liquor. As a matter of fact the constable was on duty, and the question is, does that fact make the innocent act of the appellant an offence? I do not think it does. The appellant had no intention to do a wrongful act; he acted in the bona fide belief that the constable was off duty. D It seems to me, therefore, that the contention that the appellant committed an offence is entirely an erroneous one.

E An argument in support of the conviction has been based upon the appearance of the word "knowingly" in s. 16 (1), and the omission of that word in sub-s. (2) of that section. In my opinion the only effect of this is to shift the burden of proof. In cases under sub-s. (1) of s. 16, it is for the prosecution to prove knowledge, while in cases under sub-s. (2) it is for the defendant to prove that he did not know. That is the only inference that I draw from the insertion of the word "knowingly" in sub-s. (1) of s. 16, and its omission in sub-s. (2) of that section. It appears to me that it would be straining the law to say that this publican, acting as he did in the bona fide belief that the constable was off duty, and having very reasonable grounds for that belief, was nevertheless guilty of an offence against F s. 16, for which he was liable to have his licence indorsed.

G WRIGHT, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It is not very easy to reconcile the cases on the subject, but there are many of them. The presumption is, that mens rea, an evil intention or a knowledge of the wrongfulness of the act, is an essential ingredient in every offence; but that presumption is liable to be displaced either by the words of the statute creating the offence, or by the subject-matter with which it deals, and both must be considered: Nichols v. Hall (1). One of the most remarkable exceptions was in the case of bigamy, where all the judges held, on the statute 1 Jac. 1, c. 11, that a man was rightly convicted of bigamy who had married after an invalid Scottish divorce, which had been obtained in good faith, and the validity of which he had no reason to doubt: this was R. v. Lolley (2). Another exception, apparently grounded upon the language of a statute is R. v. Prince (3), H where it was held by fifteen judges against one that a man was guilty of abduction of a girl under sixteen, although he believed, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, that she was over that age.

I Apart from isolated and extreme cases of this kind, the principal classes of exceptions may be reduced to three. One is a class of acts which, in the language of LUSH, J., in Davies v. Harvey (4), are not criminal in any real sense, but are acts which in the public interest are prohibited under a penalty. Several such instances are to be found in the decisions on the Revenue Statutes: e.g., A.-G. v. Lockwood (5), where the innocent possession of liquorice by a beer retailer was held to be an offence. So, under the Adulteration Acts, R. v. Woodrow (6), as to innocent possession of adulterated tobacco; Fitzpatrick v. Kelly (7), and Roberts v. Egerton (8), as to the sale of adulterated food. So under the Game Acts, as to the innocent possession of game by a carrier, R. v. Marsh (9). So as to the liability of a guardian of the poor, Davies v. Harvey (4). To the same head may be referred

R. v. Bishop (10), where a person was held rightly convicted of receiving lunatics in an unlicensed house, although the jury found that he honestly and on reasonable grounds believed that they were not lunatics. A

Another class comprehends some, and perhaps all, public nuisances. In R. v. Stephens (11) the employer was held liable on an indictment for a nuisance caused by workmen without his knowledge and contrary to his orders; and it was so in R. v. Medley (12) and Barnes v. Ackroyd (13). B

There may be cases where, although the proceedings may be criminal in form, they are really only a summary mode of enforcing a civil right: see the judgments of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and WILLES, JJ., in Morden v. Porter (14) as to an unintentional trespass in pursuit of game; Lee v. Simpson (15) as to unconscious dramatic piracy; and Hargreaves v. Diddams (16) as to a bona fide belief in a legally impossible right to fish. C

Except in such cases as these, there must in general be guilty knowledge on the part of the defendant, or of someone whom he has put in his place to act for him generally or in the particular matter, in order to constitute an offence. It is plain that, if the guilty knowledge is not necessary, no care on the part of the publican could save him from a conviction under s. 16, sub-s. (2) since it would be easy for the constable to deny that he was on duty when asked, or to produce a forged permission from his superior officer, as to remove his armlet before entering the public-house. I am therefore of the opinion that this conviction must be quashed. D

Inn—Innkeeper—Lien—Goods not property of guest—Commercial traveller—Goods belonging to employer—Knowledge of innkeeper. H

An innkeeper has a lien on all goods which are brought by a guest to the inn as his baggage and are received as such by the innkeeper, though the goods are not, to the knowledge of the innkeeper, the property of the guest, e.g., a commercial traveller in possession of his employer's property for sale.

E Appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of WILLS, J., at the trial without a jury.

In April, 1894, one Green, a commercial traveller in the employment of the plaintiffs, who obtained orders and sold goods on commission for them, went to stay at the defendant's inn for the purposes of his business. He stayed at the inn until the end of July. The plaintiffs from time to time sent sewing machines and other articles to Green, at the defendant's inn, for the purpose of being sold to customers

F in the district. Green became indebted to the defendant in respect of his board and lodging, and the defendant claimed to have a lien on the sewing machines which had been sent to Green by the plaintiffs, and were at the inn. Before the sewing machines were sent to the inn and before Green had incurred his debt, the defendant had been told by the plaintiffs that the goods were their goods. The plaintiffs sued the defendant for the recovery of the sewing machines, the defendant claiming G that he had a lien on them for the amount of Green's debt. WILLS, J., gave judgment for the defendant.

H LORD ESHER, M.R.—I have had no doubt about this case from the beginning. I decline to disturb a well-known and very large business, which has been carried on for centuries, on any new discovery as to the rights of innkeepers. The rights, duties and liabilities of innkeepers are founded, not on any bailment, pledge or contract, but on the custom of the realm with regard to innkeepers and on no other law. What are the liabilities of an innkeeper? If a traveller comes to an inn and I brings his luggage with him—I do not mean merely personal luggage—the innkeeper is bound to take in both him and the luggage which he brings with him. The innkeeper cannot discriminate and say that he will take in the traveller but not the luggage. Up to this time it has never been suggested that he can so discriminate, and refuse to take in the luggage. If the traveller brought with him something unusual and unreasonable, such as a tiger or a quantity of dynamite, the innkeeper would not be bound to take in either him or his luggage. The custom of the realm is that, unless there is good reason to the contrary, the innkeeper must take in a traveller and the goods which he brings with him. He is not bound to inquire as to the goods, nor is the guest bound to answer any such inquiries. If, on being asked, the guest says that the goods are not his property, but that he is bringing them with him as his luggage and insists on their being taken in, the innkeeper is bound to take them in. If the goods are of such a kind or of such quantity that the innkeeper is not bound to take them in, but the guest asks him to take them in as his travelling luggage and the innkeeper consents, then they are taken in under the custom of the realm. If the goods are taken in under the custom of the realm, the liability of the innkeeper is to keep them safely, and if they are lost or stolen, unless by the fault of the guest, the innkeeper is liable. A

In respect of this obligation to receive and the liability for safe keeping, the innkeeper has a lien on the goods for the expenses of the guest and of keeping the goods. Not by virtue of any contract or bailment, but by virtue of the custom of the realm, the innkeeper has a lien as against the true owner of the goods, and not as against the guest only. That has been the law of England for centuries. From some of the expressions of judges, and questions left to juries, which I think were immaterial, it has been argued that, if the goods do not belong to the guest and the innkeeper knows it, he may refuse to take in the goods, or may take them in not as being luggage of the guest. That cannot be so. If such goods are taken in, the guest is entitled to deal with them in the inn as if they were his own, and they are not in the exclusive possession of the innkeeper. Is there any case where it has been held that, where goods are brought by a traveller as his luggage, and taken in by the innkeeper as the luggage of the guest, though the innkeeper knew they were not the guest's property, the innkeeper has no lien and no liability? There is not a single case of that kind. That, I think, is conclusive. It has been argued that Broadwood v. Granara (1) was such a case. But that case decides only that, if a guest brings goods as his own, they are to be treated as his own. By the expression "as his own" is meant brought and received as if they were his own luggage. In Broadwood v. Granara (1), the piano was not brought to the inn as luggage at all, but only to be used by the guest while he stayed at the inn. It was not offered to, or taken by, the innkeeper as an innkeeper. That case was decided expressly on the ground that, in such a transaction, the law of innkeeper and guest did not apply. That case, therefore, is not in point here, where the goods were brought and received as if they were the baggage of the traveller. The law rests simply on the custom of the realm as to goods brought by a guest to an inn as luggage with which he is travelling, and the question of ownership is utterly immaterial, and the knowledge of the innkeeper does not signify at all. The decision of WILLS, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed. C

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiffs are the owners of some sewing machines, in respect of which they have brought this action of detinue. The defendant is an innkeeper; the goods in question came into his possession as the goods of a guest, and he says that he has a lien on them for the amount of the guest's bill. To that it is answered that he knew that the goods were not the guest's but that they belonged to the plaintiffs. The question is whether that is a good answer. H

The facts are shortly these: A traveller of the plaintiffs took some sewing machines with him, and went to the defendant's inn; while he was there other sewing machines were sent to him to sell, that is, for the same purpose as he had taken the other machines with him. These sewing machines were detained by the innkeeper, who says that he has a lien on them. I agree with the opinion of WILLS, J., that it makes no difference that these machines were sent to the guest while he was at the inn. They were received by the innkeeper in just the same way as any luggage brought by a traveller, that is, as the goods of the guest. I do not mean as the property of the guest, for the innkeeper knew that they were not; I mean as goods of the guest. There is not one case where it is denied that an innkeeper has a lien on the goods of a commercial traveller brought to an inn. That business I

A has been carried on for a very long time, and is a very extensive business. All inns receive commercial travellers. Yet it has never been denied in any case that an innkeeper has a lien on goods brought by a commercial traveller, though an innkeeper must know that they are not the property of the commercial traveller. Is there a single case in which it has been denied that an innkeeper is liable for the safe custody of the goods, because he knew that they were not the property of the traveller? There is not one. It is clear, therefore, that, if a commercial traveller takes goods with him which it is known are not his property to an inn, and the innkeeper takes him in with those goods which are the ordinary luggage of a commercial traveller, the innkeeper is liable for their safe custody in the same way as for the personal luggage of the commercial traveller, and that he has a lien on them in the same way.

C The only point now raised is whether the right of lien is defeated by the innkeeper's knowledge that the goods are not the property of the traveller. How does the innkeeper's lien arise? In Robinson v. Walter (2), it is said that it arises from the general custom of the realm. There is, in that case, a distinct statement that this law of an innkeeper's lien is founded on the general custom of the land, and that an innkeeper is not bound to inquire to whom the goods coming to the inn with a guest actually belong, and that he is bound to receive them. Then, in Broadwood v. Granara (1), where the guest hired a piano for temporary use and the innkeeper knew that that was so and allowed it to be brought to the inn for the temporary use of the guest, it was held that he had no lien. The ground of that decision is stated by all the judges thus: POLLOCK, C.B., says (10 Exch. at p. 422) that

E "this is the case of goods, not brought to the inn by a traveller as his goods, either upon his coming to or whilst staying at the inn, but they are goods furnished for his temporary use by a third person, and known by the innkeeper to belong to that person. I shall not inquire whether, if the pianoforte had belonged to the guest, the defendant would have had a lien on it. It is not necessary to decide that point, for the Case finds that it was known to the defendant that the pianoforte was not the property of the guest, and that it was sent to him for a special purpose;"

and PARKE, B., says (ibid. at p. 423) that

G "it is not necessary to advert to the decision, on the subject of an innkeeper's lien, because this is not the case of goods brought by a guest to an inn in that sense in which the innkeeper has a lien upon them; but it is the case of goods sent to the guest for a particular purpose, and known by the innkeeper to be the property of another person. It therefore seems to me that there is no pretence for saying that the defendant has any lien. The principle on which an innkeeper's lien depends is, that he is bound to receive travellers and the goods which they bring with them to the inn."

H As suggested by the Master of the Rolls, suppose that jewels are sent to a guest at an inn on approval, is it possible to say that the innkeeper has a lien in such a case? I think not, for the goods are sent to the guest for a special temporary purpose, and the innkeeper knows that, and, therefore, does not receive them as goods which a guest as a traveller would take about as his goods. Here the case is precisely the contrary. Here the goods were received into the inn as the sort of goods that this guest would take with him when travelling and an innkeeper would receive. We should effect a complete revolution in the custom of the land if we were to hold that an innkeeper had no lien in such a case as this. I think that the innkeeper's right of lien does extend to such a case as this, and that the judgment of WILLS, J., was right.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In this case a commercial traveller in the employ of the plaintiffs went to the defendant's inn, and took with him such goods as a commercial traveller would usually carry with him, and as an innkeeper would be bound to receive and take care of. Commercial travellers usually travel about the country with their employers' goods. What is the obligation of an innkeeper? He is bound to take in a commercial traveller with his baggage, and he is bound absolutely to keep the baggage safe. This obligation is imposed on the innkeeper by the custom of the realm. In consequence of that obligation, a lien is given to the innkeeper by the custom of the realm. I cannot express that better than in the words of LOPES, L.J., in Gordon v. Silber (3), where he says (25 Q.B.D. at p. 492):

“The innkeeper is under an obligation to keep the goods of a guest received into the inn safely and securely, and can be sued and made liable in damages if he fails in this respect. As a compensation for the burden thus imposed upon him, the law has given him a lien upon the goods of the guest until he discharges the expenses of his lodging and food. If the guest has brought goods to the inn to which he has no title, this will not deprive the innkeeper of his lien, because he is obliged to receive the guest without inquiries as to his title.”

I adopt that as good law, and believe it to be an accurate statement of the law. The point is now taken that that statement of the law is correct, but does not apply if that which is brought by the guest to an inn as his baggage is not his property, but the property of his master, and that is known to the innkeeper. Is there any case which supports that contention? It is said that Broadwood v. Granara (1) does. That case does not decide that point at all, because the property there in question was not brought to the inn by the guest as his luggage, but only for temporary use. The innkeeper, therefore, had no lien, because he was not bound to receive the goods. Here all the goods were brought and received as baggage of the commercial traveller which the innkeeper was bound to receive. The only question is what is the custom of the realm? The law of pledge has nothing whatever to do with the question. It is true that, in some of the cases, the judges speak about the knowledge of the innkeeper; but there is not one decision on that question. It is mentioned only because in those cases there was no knowledge. There is no authority to the effect that the lien which an innkeeper has by the custom of the realm is abrogated by the fact that the goods are not the property of the guest and that the innkeeper knows it. Suppose half the goods brought by a guest are his property and half are not, and the innkeeper knows it. I think that the innkeeper is bound to receive them all, and is subject to the same obligations as to all. I think that the judgment of WILLS, J., was right, and must be affirmed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (North, J.), November 27, 1895]

Excutor—Power to carry on business of testator—Power to postpone sale—Power to postpone to enable son of 18 to join in purchasing business.

A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees upon trust to sell with all convenient speed, and particularly to sell his business of a pawnbroker as a going concern with power to the trustees to postpone the sale of his estate, or any part thereof, for so long as they should think fit. At the date of his will all his children were young, but before his death his two eldest sons had been introduced into his business as assistants. After his death the sons, aged twenty and eighteen respectively, managed the business at a good profit, and in the opinion of the trustees it was desirable in the interests of all concerned that the business should be carried on until the second son attained twenty-one, to enable the two sons to purchase it.

Held: the will did not give the trustees power to carry on the business indefinitely, but under the circumstances of the case they might do so for a period of two years from the testator's death.

Originating Summons taken out by trustees to determine whether they would be justified in carrying on the testator's business for a certain period.

Thomas Smith, by his will made in 1889, gave the residue of his estate and effects, both real and personal, to trustees upon trust that they "shall with all convenient speed sell and convert into money my real estate and residuary personal estate, or such part thereof as shall not consist of money, and particularly shall with all convenient speed, after my decease, sell and dispose of my business of a pawnbroker (as a going concern), carried on by me at Nos. 47 and 49, Pitfield Street, Hoxton, and No. 257, Seven Sisters Road, Finsbury Park, together with the leases under which the premises are held, for the best price that can be obtained for the same."

The testator afterwards provided:

"I empower my trustees or trustee to postpone the sale and conversion of my real and personal estate, or any part thereof, for as long as they or he shall think fit, and in the meantime to let or demise any real estate, including chattels real, for any term of years not exceeding twenty-one years, to take effect in possession, at such rent and subject to such covenants and conditions as my trustees or trustee shall think fit."

The testator died on April 12, 1895, leaving a widow and four children, three sons and one daughter, aged twenty years, eighteen years, twelve years, and sixteen years respectively. Under the will his widow became entitled to receive, out of the income of the investments of the proceeds of conversion of his estate, an annuity of £300 if she remained his widow, and £100 if she married again, when the trustees were to maintain the testator's infant children during her life; and on her death the estate was to be divided among his children. When the testator made his will his children were all young; but before his death his two eldest sons, Thomas Smith and Sidney Herbert Smith, had been introduced into his business as his assistants. After the testator's death the trustees sold his business at Hoxton. But the business at Finsbury Park was being managed by the two sons at a substantial profit; and, in the opinion of the trustees, it was desirable, in the interest of all concerned, that it should be carried on until the younger attained his majority, to enable the two sons to purchase it at a higher price than would in all probability be obtained in the market.

This was an originating summons taken out by the trustees, in which the principal question raised was whether, under the provisions of the will, the trustees would be justified in carrying on the Finsbury Park business until the testator's younger son should attain twenty-one, or during some other and what period, so as to give the sons the opportunity of purchasing it.

Harman, for the defendants, did not oppose the application.

NORTH, J.—In this case I am asked to depart altogether from the terms of the testator's will. It is said that it is for the interest of the family that the trustees should carry on the business at Finsbury Park for some time. If it were an open question, I am not sure that I should not decide that it would be for the interest of the family that the business should be carried on by the trustees for some time, but I have to construe the will. The question is, what has the testator authorised? I cannot agree in the view that under this will the direction that the trustees is to be ignored because of the subsequent provision,

I think that the testator did not consider it desirable that the business should be carried on by his trustees; but that it should be sold with all convenient speed. On the other hand, he did not intend that it should be sacrificed by a forced sale. Re Crowther, Midgley v. Crowther (1) does not go so far as I am asked to do here. There are no such special words in the will in that case as here. Whether that has gone too far I will not stop to consider. What is asked here seems to me to go beyond that decision. All I can do is what the Court of Appeal did in Re Chancellor, Chancellor v. Brown (2). I am quite prepared to say that the trustees may have two years. I think I can authorise them to postpone the sale for two years from the testator's death. Of course, if a favourable opportunity arises in the mean time, it should not be thrown away. There will be liberty to apply at the end of two years. It is quite possible that the sons may buy the business. It would be worth more to them than to a stranger.

Insurance—Policy—Completed contract—Provision in proposal that policy be in force until premium paid—Provision in policy that no insurance effective until premium paid—Loss under policy before execution of policy by insurers.

A proposal for an insurance policy against loss by burglary signed by the plaintiff on Dec. 14, 1895, and containing a clause to the effect that no insurance should be considered in force until the premium had been paid was sent to the defendant insurance company. On Dec. 27 a policy of insurance for the period from Dec. 14, 1895, to Jan. 1, 1897, was duly executed by the defendants. It contained recitals of the proposal and stated that the first premium had been paid, and there was also a proviso that no insurance should be held to be effected until the premium due on the policy had been paid. On the night of Dec. 26-27 (before the execution of the policy) the plaintiff's premises were broken into and goods were stolen, no premium having then been paid.

Held: on its true construction the policy was a completed contract; by the recital the defendants had waived the proviso relating to prepayment of the premium; and, therefore, they were liable under the policy.

Appeal by the defendants, the Security Co., Ltd., from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (GRANTHAM and WRIGHT, JJ.), affirming a decision of the judge of the Leeds County Court.

The action was brought on a policy of insurance against loss by burglary or housebreaking.

On Dec. 14, 1895, the plaintiff, Mr. Vincent Roberts, signed and sent to the defendants a printed proposal form for an insurance policy against loss by burglary or housebreaking. The proposal form stated inter alia:

"policies are renewable on the first of the month, and the premium for the odd time over 12 months must be added to the first year's premium,"

and

"no insurance will be considered in force until the premium has been paid."

The proposal was for the amount of £167, and it was stated that the annual premium would be 9s. 9d., the odd time 2d. extra, and the first premium 9s. 11d.

On Dec. 18, a "protection note" was sent by the defendant company to the plaintiff in the following words:

"Mr. Vincent Roberts having made a proposal to this company for insurance against loss arising from burglary and housebreaking for the sum of £167, on property described in his proposal, and having paid to me the sum of £—, is hereby declared to be provisionally protected against that risk (subject to the conditions contained in, and endorsed on the form of policy used by the company) for seven days from this date, or until the proposal be in the meantime declined. For the Security Co., Ltd.—In the event of the above proposal being declined, the deposit now paid will be refunded, less the proportion of the premium for the period covered.”

No deposit was in fact paid by the plaintiff. On the night of Dec. 26, or early in the morning of Dec. 27, the plaintiff's house was broken into, and he thereby suffered the loss in respect of which this action was brought. On Dec. 27 there was a meeting of the directors of the company, and not knowing of the burglary that had taken place, a policy of insurance made in accordance with the terms of the proposal was signed by two directors and the secretary of the company, and the company's seal was affixed. The policy was in the following form :

“Whereas Mr. Vincent Roberts, hereinafter called the assured, has made a proposal in writing dated Dec. 14, 1895, to the Security Co., Ltd., hereinafter called the company, for an assurance of the property hereinafter described for the sums herein appearing, against the risks hereinafter mentioned, and has paid to the company the sum called in the margin hereof ‘first premium,’ being the premium required by the company for the assurance of the said property for the period from noon of the 14th day of Dec., 1895, to noon of the 1st day of Jan., 1897, now these presents witness that if at any time during the said period, or during the continuance of this assurance the premises specified in the schedule hereto be unlawfully broken into, etc., . . . provided also that this assurance is made upon the faith and basis of the aforesaid proposal in writing, together with any further written particulars given by the assured and is subject to the several conditions indorsed hereon, which are to be taken as part of the policy, and that no assurance by way of renewal or otherwise shall be held to be effected until the premium due thereon shall have been paid.”

On the margin of the policy the “first premium” was stated to be 9s. 11d., and the renewal premium 9s. 9d. The policy when executed remained in the possession of the company. The plaintiff had not in fact paid any premium to the company, and stated, when giving evidence at the trial of the action, that he had not paid it, because he had not been asked for it. The company refused to indemnify the plaintiff for the loss he had incurred on the ground that, no premium having been paid, no contract of insurance had ever been completed. The plaintiff brought this action to enforce his claim in the Leeds County Court, and there recovered judgment. The Queen's Bench Division (GRANTHAM and WRIGHT, JJ.) affirmed the judgment of the county court judge. The defendant company appealed.

Channell, Q.C., and G. M. Cohen for the defendant company.
Longstaffe, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

LORD ESHER, M.R.—I do not think that the cases that have been cited govern the present case at all. The question is not one merely of the effect of the proposal for insurance and its acceptance. A formal policy had been signed and sealed on Dec. 27, 1895. Was that policy completely effected on that day or was it only a conditional policy, that is to say, is there any evidence of any condition that it was not to be a policy until certain conditions were fulfilled? The policy itself contains at the end a statement that the company have caused their common seal to be affixed and that two of the directors and the secretary of the company have thereunto set their hands. But it was contended that the policy when signed and sealed remained in the hands or in the office of the company. It was not suggested, and indeed there is no evidence to support such a suggestion, that the company ever delivered the policy to someone to hold it as an escrow. We merely have the fact that, after the

A policy had been signed and sealed, and had left the board of directors, it remained in the hands of the secretary to the company. If it remained in the possession of the company it could not be an escrow, because when a deed is executed as an escrow it must be handed over to some one not a party to it to hold as an escrow. The policy might have been delivered by the company as an escrow; but they did not so deliver it, and never intended to deliver it as an escrow. It is, therefore, a policy properly executed by the company, and the only thing remaining is to construe it to see how it applies to the facts which have occurred.

Let us then see what it says. It begins with a recital that

C “the assured has made a proposal in writing, dated Dec. 14, 1895, to the Security Co., Ltd., hereinafter called the company, for an assurance of the property hereinafter described for the sums herein appearing against the risks hereinafter mentioned and has paid to the company the sum called in the margin hereof ‘first premium,’ being the premium required by the company for the assurance of the said property for the period from noon of Dec. 14, 1895, to noon of Jan. 1, 1897.”

D It then goes on to declare the assured insured by the company against certain injuries to his premises which might occur between Dec. 14, 1885, and Jan. 1, 1897. In answer to those statements it is said that part of the recital is untrue, and it is proposed to show that the premium there stated to have been paid has in fact not been paid. In the first place it seems to me that the company are not at liberty to show that against their own deed. They cannot rely upon the fact of the premium not having been paid if they have treated it as paid, and they have waived any payment. Reference was made to a custom or practice in marine insurance that the premiums on a policy may be paid at any moment. That is merely a practice for the convenience of trade. The best way of dealing with this case is to say that if the company are not estopped from saying that the premium had not been paid, they have waived its prepayment. The company could ask for it at any time and then it must be paid. If there is a loss it is a common practice among insurers to deduct from the sum payable to the assured any premiums that happen to remain unpaid at the time. That can be done here. I am clearly of opinion that the company cannot get out of the liability imposed upon them by the policy merely on the ground that the premiums had not been paid by the plaintiff. The appeal must be dismissed.

G LOPES, L.J.—I agree. I think that the judgments of the county court judge and of the Divisional Court were both right. I do not myself pay much regard either to the proposal or the cover note. I think that they came to an end when the policy was executed, and the only question which we have now to consider is, whether there was a concluded agreement. My opinion is that this policy was properly executed, and established a complete transaction between the parties. Therefore it seems to me that there is no need for us to take into consideration the intimation which is to be found in the proposal that no policy is to attach until the premium is paid. In the recitals of the policy itself is to be found a positive statement that the first premium has been paid. Yet the company now seek to go against their own statement in the deed, and endeavour to show that it has not been paid. I am of opinion that by their statement in the policy they are estopped from showing that the premium has not been paid. But, even if there should not be this estoppel, there seems to me to be such clear evidence of waiver as to put the matter beyond all doubt. I therefore come to the conclusion that the policy of insurance, executed as it is, is conclusive proof of a concluded agreement between the parties. I think that if the plaintiff had gone to the company's office the day after the policy had been executed, and had tendered the premium and demanded the deed, the company would have had no answer, but would have been legally bound to deliver it up to him.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The policy of insurance which was executed on Dec. 27, 1895, by the seal of the company being affixed to it, and by the signatures of two directors and of the secretary to the company, treated the insurance of the plaintiff, which was thereby intended to be effected, as having begun on Dec. 14 then last past. The annual premium to be paid was 9s. 9d., but for the first year the premium was to be 9s. 11d., the additional 2d. being payable in respect of the days between Dec. 14, 1895, and the end of the year. That is to say, the company was charging a premium of 2d. for a period which had begun before the policy was executed, and which was to extend for some few days after the execution. In my judgment the company had, to say the least, which is enough for this case, waived the prepayment of the 2d. which was the premium payable for the period in which the loss occurred. I also think that they waived the prepayment of the whole of the first premium, but of course the waiver of 9s. 9d., part of that premium, is of no consequence because the loss took place before the expiration of the current year.

In the first place an attempt was made to show that this policy was not a deed. I do not know whether it would be of much assistance to the company to succeed in showing that, but in my judgment it is clearly a deed, and I do not see how it is possible to say that, after its execution there was no bargain between the plaintiff and the company. Even if it had been shown that the policy had been delivered as an escrow, and was not to be handed over to the plaintiff except on the condition of his having paid the premium, nevertheless I consider that when the condition had been performed it would have been as good a deed as if it had been delivered unconditionally at the moment of its execution. The result would be that the plaintiff would have been entitled to go to the secretary of the company, and, on paying the 9s. 11d. to demand the policy. That is the position he is taking up now. The company contend that he has no right to ask for the policy to be delivered up to him now, because he has not actually tendered the 9s. 11d. But he is now suing the company for what he claims to be due under the policy, and he says he was always ready to pay the premium, and that he had a right, on paying it, to ask for the policy. Of course, it would be idle for him to offer the 9s. 11d. now. It is clear that since the loss occurred the company would never have accepted it from him. The plaintiff was entitled at any time to the possession of the deed on payment of the premium, and I think that the company is liable under the policy, subject to the deduction of the 9s. 11d. which the plaintiff has not paid under it.

Estate Duty—Passing of property—Passing subject to incumbrances—Settled property mortgaged prior to re-settlement—Life interest charged with annuity—Allowances for incumbrances on death of life tenant—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 30), s. 1.

By the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1: "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Part of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty, called 'estate duty,' at the graduated rates hereinafter mentioned. . . ."

Property was settled on a father for life with remainder to his son in tail. The father and son joined in executing a disentailing assurance, whereby they settled the property to such uses as they should jointly appoint, and, subject thereto, in such manner as it was previously settled. They then jointly borrowed money on mortgage of the settled property, which, under their joint power, they appointed and conveyed to the mortgagees. Out of the money so borrowed, the amount secured by a previously existing mortgage of the father's life interest was paid off, but the mortgage was transferred to the new mortgagees as a further security. The balance of the money borrowed was paid partly to the father and partly to the son. Subsequently, the father charged his life interest with a payment during his life of an annuity to the son. The father died while the mortgage was still subsisting, and the son succeeded to the equity of redemption. In computing the value of the property passing on the death of the father and liable to estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894,

Held: the case fell within s. 1 of the Act, and a deduction should be made from the gross value of the settled property in respect of the mortgage debt, but no deduction should be made in respect of the annuity.

Mar. 14, 1899. The following opinions were read.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—The question in this case is, on what property the duty is payable by the appellant under the Finance Act, 1894. That statute enacts in the first section that certain duties shall be levied and paid on the principal value of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of a person dying after the commencement of the Act.

The second Earl Cowley died possessed of the equity of redemption of certain estates, and the appellant, to whom that property had passed, is undoubtedly liable to pay the duties ascertained in the specified manner. It does not appear to me that that question is a very difficult one. What I have described as the equity of redemption is undoubtedly the true description of the property and what passed on the death of the second earl to the third earl was the equity of redemption. How the value of that is to be ascertained is for this purpose unimportant. The thing which is liable to duty is that property and no other thing.

For the purpose of my opinion I discard all reference to s. 7, which is only applicable to the mode of determining the value of an estate, whatever that estate is; and, if I am right that the estate which the second earl possessed was that which came to the third earl by the second earl's death, we have nothing to do with allowances or the series of enactments on that subject, but the whole question

A must be determined on the property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passed on the death of the second earl. I have great difficulty in following the reasoning by which in the Court of Appeal it has been held that one is at liberty to go back to the history of the property to which the third earl succeeded, and to split up that property into the different interests of which it was originally composed. If I may trace out in this case the life estate and the remainder in fee or in
B tail, I do not know how far back in the history of the property in question I may be entitled to go, nor am I quite certain what is intended to be effected by such an inquiry. There is no part of the Finance Act which appears to me to give ground for such an investigation, and I do not know that the adoption of any such principle by your Lordships would not have a far wider operation than on such taxation
C questions as arise in such cases. It would seem to me to be a very pertinent question to ask whether the deeds which were executed in 1887 by the late earl and the appellant did or did not operate as they purported to operate or not, and if not, why not? But if they did, what prevented the appellant and his father granting a mortgage to the Prudential Co. on the settled estates? What was done with the money seems to me to be immaterial. Though as a matter of fact the D greater part of it was paid to liquidate the liabilities of the second earl, there was a second mortgage for the security of a further advance of £20,000; but in the view that I take of this case it is immaterial to pursue the destination of the money or the source from which it came. As a matter of fact, the whole property which is in question on this part of this case is the equity of redemption. If that is all that the appellant has received, that is all on which he is bound to pay duty.

E Your Lordships have already held in A.-G. v. Beech (1) that where a tenant for life and remainderman in fee combine so as to get complete command of the estate in fee, they may dispose of it as they will, and I am unable to comprehend why, when they grant a mortgage in fee, that transaction is capable of being dissected so as to prevent the union of the two estates, and by an artificial process resolve the estate into its original elements or into its original settlement and treat them
F as though such new arrangement had not been made at all. It would seem as though the argument suggested (although the Act does not say so) that the ordinary transaction of a re-settlement of an estate can, for the purpose of the Finance Act, be traced back to any period, however remote, and duties exacted on the artificial theory that you must treat each death in the chain of investigation as giving rise to liability to duty under an Act passed long after the re-settle-
G ment on the death.

There is only one argument, viz., the conveyancing point referred to by HENN-COLLINS, L.J., which seems to give any ground for looking back to the history of the transactions out of which this question has arisen. It appears that the incumbrances which did or might have existed were assigned to the company advancing the money as a protection to them in case any claim should be made in respect
H of some dealing with his life estate by the second earl. If it had been found that any such dealing had taken place, the lenders wanted to have a right which should take precedence of any such dealing; but I confess I am unable to understand how this transaction could affect or in any way interfere with the power of the second and third earls to re-settle the estate, or, having re-settled it, to grant a mortgage in fee such as they did grant with the result which I have described. I am wholly
I unable to give any such interpretation to an Act which seems to me in its ordinary and natural meaning to be clear enough, and I for one decline to go into a minute investigation as to how the equity of redemption was created. It is enough for me that that is the property which under s. 1 of the Act has passed to the appellant, and that alone is the property on which he is liable to duty.

I see no ground for dealing with s. 2, since, for the reasons which I have given, I think that it is s. 1 to which you must look to see what property, real or personal, settled or not settled, passed on the death of the second to the third earl; but, if I were compelled to give a construction to s. 2 (1) (b), I should come to the same conclusion in respect of the liability to duty, since I think that the benefit accruing or arising to the third earl was only to the extent of the value of the equity of redemption. But, as I have said, the question must be determined on s. 1 alone. A

As to the claim by the appellant to a deduction in respect of the cesser of the rentcharge of £3,000 a year, it is enough to say that the argument in respect of it is hardly intelligible, and certainly the appellant has made out no case to establish it. B No question as to the policies has been raised, and I therefore do not refer to them. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and with costs.

LORD WATSON.—The appellant, the third Earl Cowley, succeeded by the death of his father, the second earl, in the year 1894 to an equitable interest in what I shall, for the sake of brevity, term the settled estates of Mornington. C These estates were originally settled on trust by the will of Richard Arthur, the fifth and last Earl of Mornington. On the death of the testator an equitable interest in the estates passed to the first Earl Cowley, and on his death to the second earl. The interest of the first and second earls was limited to an estate in tail, but by the terms of the will the appellant, on the death of his father, was entitled to an estate expectant in fee. D

By deed dated Jan. 22, 1867, the second Earl Cowley, at that time Viscount Dangan, in consideration of a contingent deferred annuity of £1,671 payable to him during his lifetime after the death of the first earl by the London Assurance Corpn., conveyed to that corporation in security the estate and interest under the will to which he might become entitled on his father's decease. E And on Feb. 7, 1868, the succession having then opened to him, the second Earl Cowley obtained from the London Assurance Corpn. certain advances and obligations, and in respect thereof executed in favour of the corporation a mortgage of his life rent interest in the settled estates.

In order to explain the questions which have been raised for decision on this appeal, it is necessary to refer to certain proceedings which took place before the passing of the Finance Act, 1894, during the joint lifetime of the appellant and his father. F The second Earl Cowley and the present appellant on Jan. 14, 1887, executed a disentailing assurance by which they appointed the trustees of the original settlement to continue to hold the estates, but freed and discharged of the earl's estate in tail male and all other estates in tail of the appellant, and of all rights, interests, and powers to take effect after the determination or defeasance of such estates in tail male, or in tail, to such uses, on such trusts, and with and G subject to such powers and provisions and in such manner as the second earl and the appellant might at any time or times thereafter by any deed or deeds jointly direct and appoint. In default of and until such appointment the estates were to be held by the said trustees to the use of the then Earl Cowley during his life, without impeachment of waste, by way of restoration of the estate vested in him immediately before the execution of the deed of disentail. H The appellant and his father thereafter borrowed the sum of £210,000 from the Prudential Assurance Co., Ltd., and, in security for its repayment, they, on June 8, 1888, by virtue of the powers reserved to them, jointly granted a mortgage to the company for that amount over the settled estates. Of the sum thus advanced by the Prudential Co., £150,853 6s. 7d. was paid by that company, at the request of the mortgagors, to the London Assurance Corpn., being the total amount of the liabilities which at that date the second I Earl Cowley had incurred to the latter corporation, on the security of the life rent interest which he had before the disentail. On June 8, 1888, the London Assurance Corpn., on receiving full payment of the debts then owing to them by the second earl, executed, as had been agreed on, an assignment to the Prudential Assurance Co., Ltd., of annuities granted to the second earl, and of the mortgage debts created by the same earl, amounting in the aggregate to £79,500, together with full right and benefit of the assignors' powers and securities for compelling payment of these several debts, with interest due or to become due thereon.

A The second earl and the appellant, in the further exercise of their reserved powers, executed on June 9, 1888, with consent of the trustees in whom the estates were legally vested, a deed of re-settlement of the equity of redemption. The trusts on which the estates were to be held were declared to be (inter alia): (i) Subject to such powers and provisions as the appellant and his father should by any deed or deeds, revocable or irrevocable, jointly appoint; (ii) that the appellant, his
B executors, administrators, and assigns, should receive, during the periods and in the manner provided by and subject to the stipulations contained in the third schedule, the annual sums or annuities therein respectively mentioned, and subject and charged as aforesaid; (iii) the continuance of the second earl's life rent estate, in restoration and by way of confirmation of the life estate limited to him by the will of the Earl of Mornington; and on the cesser of that estate (iv) on trust for the
C appellant and his assigns during his life, without impeachment of waste; and (v) from and after the appellant's decease, on trust for the first and every other son of the appellant successively in remainder one after the other, according to their respective seniorities, and the heirs male of their respective bodies; and (vi) in default of such issue, on trust for the second and every subsequent-born son of the D appellant's father, successively in remainder one after the other, according to their respective seniorities, and the heirs male of their respective bodies. The annuities provided to the appellant and his assigns were as follows: During the lifetime of the second earl an annuity of £1,000, to be increased in certain events to the amount of £2,000, £2,200, £2,700, and £3,200 respectively. By the same deed it was mutually agreed that the second earl, his heirs, executors, and administrators,
E should be primarily liable for the interest accruing due on the sum of £210,000 borrowed on mortgage from the Prudential Assurance Co.; that, in the event of his predecease, the same liability should attach to the appellant; and that, after the death of the longest liver of them, the mortgaged premises should be the primary fund for payment of the said sum of £210,000, and the interest thenceforth to accrue thereon. The appellant and his father obtained a further advance of £20,000
F from the Prudential Assurance Co., for which they, on Dec. 14, 1889, executed a second mortgage to the company, charging the settled estates. Of the total sum of £230,000 received by them from the company, £197,987 11s. 8d. was paid to or on behalf of the second earl, and £30,012 8s. 4d. to or for the appellant. The appellant, until the death of the second earl, which occurred on Feb. 28, 1895, was in receipt of the annuity payable quarterly, as provided in the deed of re-settlement and in the
G third schedule of that deed.

After the death of his father, the appellant lodged a statement and valuation of the amount on which he was liable to pay duty under the Finance Act, 1894. The Inland Revenue Comrs., the respondents in this appeal, accepted the gross estimate, but disallowed two items which were claimed as deductions from it by the appellant. These were (i) the sum of £230,000 with which the settled estates had been charged,
H as aforesaid, in favour of the Prudential Assurance Co.; and (ii) a sum of £65,200, being the capitalised value at twenty-one and eleven-fifteenths years' purchase of the annuities payable to the appellant during the life of his father, and amounting, at the death of the latter, to £3,000 per annum. The appellant then brought the present suit, in accordance with the provisions of s. 10 of the Finance Act, 1894, in which he craved a declaration to the effect that these two items ought to be
I allowed as deductions.

The case was first heard before a Divisional Court consisting of POLLOCK, B., and BRUCE, J., who made a declaration as craved with respect to the first of these items, and, as regards the second, affirmed the decision of the Inland Revenue Comrs. The Court of Appeal, which consisted of A. L. SMITH, RIGBY, and HENN COLLINS, L.JJ., reversed the judgment of the Divisional Court on the first item, and affirmed it on the second. The legal questions raised by these points are so different in their character that I shall notice them separately.

I have come without much difficulty to the conclusion that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed, and the judgment of the Divisional Court A restored. With regard to the second deduction claimed by the appellant, I have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the decisions of both courts below were right. Very little was said about the point in the argument of the learned counsel for the appellant, and, so far as I can see, their reticence was not injudicious. The annuities, the capitalised value of which forms the subject of the claim, were regularly paid to the appellant during his father's lifetime, and they ceased to be payable on his death. No part of them formed a charge on the equitable estate to which the appellant has succeeded, under the deed of re-settlement, not in fee, but in life rent. In these circumstances I do not think it can with any degree of plausibility be maintained that the estate which passed to the appellant on his father's death has been thereby diminished or affected. B

The argument addressed to us with reference to the other point, the charge of £230,000 advanced on mortgage by the Prudential Assurance Co., Ltd., did not, so far as I could discern, involve any serious question as to the construction of the Finance Act. It turned mainly, if not exclusively, on the real character and legal effect of the deeds by which the advance was secured. On the one hand, it was not disputed by the appellant's counsel that if the original settlement of the Mornington estates had remained unaltered, and those deeds had been executed by the late earl as life-renter, and by the appellant as expectant fiar, no part of the sum of £230,000 would have formed a proper deduction from the amount on which the appellant is liable for duty. In that case the appellant would have derived benefit from his father's decease to the extent to which he had borrowed on the security of his right in expectancy, and would thereby have been enabled to pay his own debt. On the other hand, counsel for the Crown hardly ventured to dispute that if the £230,000 had been duly charged by the original settlor or had been subsequently validly charged on the fee of the settled estates, the appellant must be held to have taken the estates cum onere and could not be held on his father's death to have taken any benefit from the charge of £230,000, or in the estates, so far as these were affected by it. C D E F

The learned counsel for the respondents accordingly addressed themselves to the bold and, in my opinion, somewhat extravagant contention that, notwithstanding the tenor of the securities held by the Prudential Assurance Co., the reality of the transaction between the company and the mortgagors, apart from any question as to the form of conveyancing adopted in the deeds, consisted in the second Earl Cowley and the appellant merely pledging their respective rights of life rent and expectant fee. I should not have thought that the argument was deserving of much consideration, had it not been that it appears to have found favour with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal. A. L. SMITH, L.J., who was of the same opinion with the other learned lords justices, after stating that the second earl's life estate was not extinguished or merged into an equitable estate in fee in the Prudential Co., goes on to say : G H

“The real substance of what was done, and this is what is to be looked at apart from the form of conveyancing, was that the second earl mortgaged his life estate in the settled estates to the Prudential Co. and that his son mortgaged his reversion in such estates to that company to secure the repayment of the £230,000, and that this was the real transaction, whether it was bound to be carried out by one deed or by two.” I

The argument thus stated appears to me to ignore these facts, that, in the first place, the Finance Act, 1894, does not prohibit the alteration or modification of the terms of the settlement by any legitimate means; and, in the second place, that, assuming the proceedings taken in the years 1887, 1888, and 1889, for disentailing, charging with debt, and resettling the estates, to have been at the time valid, the Act of 1894 does not contain a single provision which, either directly or indirectly, denies effect

A to them. It is not maintained on behalf of the Crown that any one of these proceedings was illegitimate or invalid. The disentailing assurance had the legal effect of vesting the second earl and his son with the full right and title to dispose of the life rent and the fee of the settled estates; and in virtue of that right and title they entered into onerous contracts with the Prudential Co., by which they professed to convey, and did convey, to the company in security the immediate fee of the estate. B Notwithstanding the reasoning of the learned lords justices, I fail to comprehend how the merger or non-merger of the second earl's life estate could possibly affect the title of the earl and his son to convey the immediate fee. I see no reason to doubt that, under their two conveyances, the company acquired, and from the date of the completion of their securities was possessed of, an interest in the fee which was effectual against the beneficiaries under the settlement made by the last Earl C of Mornington, including the appellant. I think the appellant took the estate cum onere of the charge of £230,000, which, under the settlement as modified, affected the settled estates in the same way as if it had been created by the original settlor; and that on his father's death no interest or benefit accrued to the appellant in respect of any part of the estates which was covered by the securities of the Prudential Assurance Co. Any other conclusion is, to my mind at variance with the substance and reality of the transaction.

A certain degree of colour was lent to the respondent's argument by the circumstance that the Prudential Co. took an assignment of the debts due by the second earl to the London Assurance Corpn. which were charged on his life estate, with the same powers of recovery which were competent to their assignors. The object E of the company in taking the assignment apparently was not to impair the security which they had obtained from the appellant and his father over the immediate fee of the settled estates, but to enable them to compete with creditors, if any, to whom the second earl might possibly have previously conveyed his life estate. In short, the assignment was a precautionary device resorted to in order to meet the possibilities of events which have never occurred.

F LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The principle on which the Finance Act, 1894, was founded is that whenever property changes hands on death the State is entitled to step in and take toll of the property as it passes, without regard to its destination or to the degree of relationship, if any, that may have subsisted between the deceased and the person or persons succeeding. Section 1 gives effect to that principle. Subject to certain exceptions or savings, it imposes a duty called estate duty upon G the principal value of all property "settled or not settled" which passes on death. Section 2 is merely subsidiary and supplemental. It was intended apparently to sweep in a few cases which were thought, perhaps, to be within the spirit though not within the letter of the proposed enactment, or else were supposed likely to lead to evasion if not made equally subject to estate duty. Section 2, therefore, I declares that the expression "property passing on the death of the deceased" shall be "deemed to include" property classified under four different heads, to no one of which does that expression literally apply. The rest of the Act deals with matters of detail, valuation, and machinery. Section 1 contains the pith and substance of the enactment. It is comprehensive, broad, and clear. The other provisions of the Act which were dragged into the discussion, rather unnecessarily as it seems to me, are strangely confused and singularly ill-drawn. But still I do not think that the Act is wholly to blame for the perplexity in which the learned judges below found themselves entangled. I think that they took a wrong turn at starting. They left the broad highway for a narrow by-path which led in a wrong direction and presented difficulties increasing at every step. Is it any wonder if they came to a wrong conclusion?

The first question, as it seems to me, the question that lies at the very threshold of our inquiry, is simply this: Under which section of the Finance Act, 1894, does the present case fall? Is it the ordinary and normal case of property passing on death, or is it one of those exceptional cases in which property is deemed to pass, though there is no passing of property in fact? Does it come under s. 1 or under s. 2? The learned judges of the Court of Appeal, one and all, have held that the case is not within s. 1. The reason is given by A. L. SMITH, L.J. His Lordship quotes the words of s. 1, and then goes on to say :

“This section would not, I think, embrace the present case, for the life estate of the second earl ceased at his death and passed to no one.”

I must say I cannot think that reasoning satisfactory. What the Act has in view for the purpose of taxation is property passing on death, not the interest of the deceased, which, if it be a limited interest, can never pass. With an interest that ceases on death the Act is not directly concerned except in the one case where, without any passing of property, a benefit accrues or arises by reason of the cesser of a determinable interest, such as a charge that expires. In every case in which property comprised in a settlement passes on death, the life estate or other limited interest of the preceding owner must have ceased for good and all. If the criterion proposed by the learned lord justice were the true criterion, settled property could not in any case come within s. 1. But then that section expressly and in terms applies to settled property. You might just as well strike the word “settled” out of s. 1 altogether as hold that the section does not embrace a case where a limited interest under a settlement ceases on death and passes to no one.

I am therefore compelled to differ from the Court of Appeal at the very outset. I think that the present case falls within s. 1. I think that it belongs to a class of cases which the authors of the Act had directly in view when they framed that section. If the case falls within s. 1, it cannot also come within s. 2. The two sections are mutually exclusive. Section 1 might properly, I think, be headed “With regard to property passing on death, be it enacted as follows.” Section 2 might with equal propriety be headed, “And with regard to property not passing on death, be it enacted as follows.” I cannot therefore agree with RIGBY, L.J., when he says that s. 2 is a provision “explanatory” of s. 1. In my opinion the two sections are quite distinct, and s. 2 throws no light on s. 1. But, then, no doubt s. 2 speaks of “property in which the deceased . . . had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased.” And that, it may be said, was just the position of the second Earl with regard to the Mornington settled estates. So it was. But s. 2 does not apply to an interest in property which passes on the death of the deceased. That is already dealt with in the earlier section. For if property passing on death was in the lifetime of the deceased subject to a charge or interest which ceased on the death, the property must of course pass free from that charge or interest, and so passing it must of course be valued accordingly. That is s. 1. You do not want s. 2 for that. You cannot resort to s. 2, for that would be giving the duty twice over. The Crown cannot have it both ways. Double duty is forbidden by the Act. It is interesting, and I think instructive, to refer to s. 4 and s. 5 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853 [repealed], from which the provisions of s. 2 (1) (a) and s. 2 (1) (b) are evidently adapted. The marginal note to s. 4 is this : “General powers of appointment to confer successions.” In the Succession Duty Act a power of appointment confers a succession when it is exercised, but only then. In the analogous provision of the Finance Act, “property of which the deceased was competent to dispose at the time of his death” is deemed to pass though the power be not exercised. Then the marginal note to s. 5 of the Succession Duty Act runs as follows : “Extinction of determinable charges to confer successions.” The section itself provides that “Where any property shall . . . be subject to any charge, estate, or interest determinable by the death of any person . . . the increase of benefit accruing to any person or persons upon the extinction or determination of such charge, estate, or interest shall be deemed to be a succession.”

A It is quite plain, I think, that the provisions of s. 2 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894, have been borrowed and adapted from that section. But they do not, as I said just now, refer to the cesser of an interest in property which passes, but to the cesser of an interest in property which does not pass. On reading the Act I think that this is made tolerably clear not only by the opening sentence of s. 2 (1), but also by the directions for valuing "the benefit accruing or arising from the cesser of an interest B ceasing on the death of the deceased" in s. 7 (7). If property passes, you can put a value on it by considering what it would fetch in the open market. You must resort to other means in order to estimate the value of property deemed to pass when an interest ceases. And here I would venture to say that, in my opinion, the provisions of s. 7 (7) (b) are not open to the severe censure passed on them in the Court of Appeal. They are quite intelligible if s. 2 (1) (b) be confined to the case C which it was really intended to meet. The difficulty, so far as there is any, comes from the drafting of s. 2 (1) (b). There would have been none, I think, if the draftsmen had been content to follow the wording of the Succession Duty Act. But the general word "interest" without the word "charge" preceding it at first sight seems to point rather to a life interest than to a determinable charge. And thus it was, I think, that the Court of Appeal were led into the error which seems to run through D their judgment.

If the present case is within s. 1, and not within s. 2, the only remaining question is, what was the settled property that passed on the death of the second earl? "Settled property," according to the definition of that expression in the Finance Act, 1894, "means property comprised in a settlement." It is difficult to see what else it could possibly mean. But at any rate it is a comfort to find something in the E Act about which there can be no dispute. The settled property in this case is the property comprised in the re-settlement of June 9, 1888. What was that property? Why, the equity of redemption of the Mornington estates, which were subject to certain incumbrances described as the over-riding charges, and subject also to the mortgage in fee simple in favour of the Prudential Assurance Co. to secure £230,000. There can be no doubt about that. What, then, was the principal value of the F settled property? That, according to s. 7 (5), must be estimated at the price which, in the opinion of the commissioners, the property comprised in the re-settlement would have fetched, if sold in the open market at the time of the second earl's death. What right the commissioners can have to swell that estimate by adding to it a sum equal to the amount of the Prudential mortgage, I cannot understand. The G mortgage did not pass on the death of the second earl. The mortgage debt was no part of the settled property. It diminished the property before re-settlement. I may remark in passing that we are not concerned with s. 7 (1). Whatever the meaning of that section may be, as to which I do not hazard a conjecture, it can have nothing to do with the present case, for in the present case the property which had to be brought into the aggregated estate "for determining the rate of duty" was not subject to any debt. It was only the equity of redemption that was re-settled. H

Then we had a long argument about the doctrine of merger, and an argument, longer still, intended to persuade the House that, for the purpose of this Act, the transaction with the Prudential ought to be split up into two distinct mortgages, one by the second earl and one by the present earl, one by the father mortgaging his life estate and one by the son mortgaging his reversion. The Court of Appeal I say that was the real transaction. In my opinion it was nothing of the kind. The Prudential Co. bargained for a mortgage in fee simple and a mortgage in fee simple they got. Why the commissioners should seek to reform a deed which carried out the transaction between the parties in the way in which everybody wished to have it carried out is beyond my comprehension. The argument seems to be founded on a fallacious analogy. Because in the case of succession duty it is necessary and proper to trace a disposition of property to its origin for the purpose of seeing out of whose interest the succession is derived, and so discovering the predecessor, therefore it seems to be thought that you are at liberty in the case of the Finance

Act to dissect and pull to pieces one entire and completed transaction in order to enable the Crown to exact duty in respect of property which neither passed nor can be deemed to pass.

Nor, again, can I see how the question is affected by the circumstance that mortgages, in fact paid off, were transferred and kept alive for the purpose of forming a protection against mesne incumbrances during the life of the tenant for life. That is every-day practice. Every beginner is acquainted with that device. HENN COLLINS, L.J., thinks it decisive in favour of the commissioners. With deference I think it has nothing to do with the question. If, indeed, it could be shown that by the cesser of that protective interest any benefit arose or accrued to anybody under s. 2 (1) (b) which has not already been taken into account and could be valued under s. 7 (7), there might be some show of reason in the argument. But that would be a hopeless contention under the circumstances. The result is that in my opinion the commissioners are wrong from beginning to end on the main point. Some people think the Act a harsh Act as it stands. It would be intolerable if it could be construed as the commissioners desire to construe it.

As regards the minor point urged by counsel for the appellant, I think that the claim to deduct the value of the £3,000 annuity must fail. There is no foundation for it; the property passed free from the annuity, and the Act makes no provision for any such allowance. There was a provision to that effect in the Succession Duty Act, 1853 [repealed]. At any rate, s. 38 of that Act was so construed in this House: (Lord Braybrooke v. A.-G. (2); I.R. Comrs. v. Harrison (3)). But there is no analogous provision in the Finance Act, 1894.

I agree that the appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below.

LORD MORRIS.—I agree a priori it would be expected that an estate duty accruing on a death would be calculated on the amount of property left by the deceased at the time of his death, and would be payable by the person getting the property so left to the extent to which he did get it. Has the Finance Act, 1894, enacted anything more than that? The appellant on the death of his father succeeded to an equity of redemption in the Cowley estate, a mortgage of £230,000 affecting it. Much of the argument in the case has been addressed to the state of the title under the Mornington will, which in my opinion is beside the question, as are all considerations of how the title stood antecedent to the indenture of resettlement of June 9, 1898, that was the settlement under the provisions of which the property passes. It also appears to me to be irrelevant to inquire into the conveyancing mazes or devices by which that was effected. The substance is that the estate was mortgaged, and that an equity of redemption remained. If the property passed to the appellant on the death of his father under s. 1—as I consider it did—I ask, what passed? Surely a property subject to a mortgage; or if the property is to be deemed to pass under s. 2, sub-s. (1) (b) enacts that it is to be deemed to pass to the extent to which a benefit accrues. I ask what extent of benefit in the res of the Cowley property comes to any person by reason of the death of Lord Cowley? Surely the difference between the value of the Cowley estate and the amount of the mortgage or prior charge.

With respect to the allowance claimed by the appellant by reason of the ceasing of the rentcharge payable to him during the lifetime of his father, I fail to see any sound argument for such contention. He succeeded to the Cowley property onerated with its charges; and that he at the same time ceased to enjoy a rentcharge is an indifferent fact.

LORD SHAND.—On the point on which LORD MACNAGHTEN has strongly insisted, I agree in holding that this case falls within the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1. The property in question, having been disentailed, formed the subject of a deed of resettlement under which it again became “settled estate,” as defined in the Act. What, then, was the settled estate beneficial in its nature which passed to the

A appellant on the death of his father, the late Earl Cowley? The answer to that question is, I think, the right to the possession and enjoyment of the settled estate as a right of absolute property no longer burdened by the right of life rent of his father, the late earl. This right may be well described in technical legal language as the equity of redemption, which is so described, I presume, because of the power which the appellant has to acquire and enjoy not only an absolute but an unburdened B right of fee or property by payment of the amount secured by mortgages on the estate and to which that estate was subject. But in ordinary language one would justly say the estate itself passed on the death of the deceased earl to the appellant his son, and so estate duty became due. What, then, is the value of that estate? It was well and validly charged with a debt of £230,000 which formed a burden on the succession which opened to the appellant, and I confess that I can see no answer C to the appellant's demand to have the amount of that charge or burden taken into view as a deduction from the value of the estate in estimating the estate duty payable, and which became due on free estate only.

I have only to add that I agree in thinking that the circumstances that the Prudential Assurance Co., in transacting with the late earl and the appellant in the advances they made, took an assignment of the debts due by the second earl to the London D Assurance Corpn., and the securities given for these debts can have no effect on the determination of the present question. That assignment was given and taken obviously for a purpose quite in common use, that purpose being only to enable the Prudential Co. to compete with creditors, if there were any, in whose favour the second earl might have granted securities affecting his life rent right.

E LORD DAVEY.—I entirely concur in the observations which have been made, and I should not add anything were it not that we are differing from a unanimous and carefully considered judgment of the Court of Appeal.

The first and principal question is whether the mortgage for £230,000 ought to be deducted in assessing the value of the settled estates for the purpose of the payment of estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894. I agree with the views so fully and F clearly expressed by LORD MACNAGHTEN as to the construction of that Act, and I think that the present case—the facts of which I need not recapitulate—clearly falls within s. 1. But in my opinion, whether it falls within s. 1 or s. 2, we arrive at the same result.

By s. 1 of that Act the tax is imposed on all property, settled or unsettled, which G passes on the death of any person, and by s. 2 (1) property passing on the death of the deceased is to be deemed to include the property following. The only material words for the present purpose are in sub-s. (1) (b) :

“Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises H by the cesser of such interest.”

I ask myself, therefore, what property passed on the death of the second earl, or—which appears to me in this case to be the same question in other words—in what property had the second earl an interest ceasing on his death, and did a benefit then accrue or arise? The Court of Appeal have held that the property passing was I the whole value of the estates without deduction of the Prudential Company's mortgage. And they have come to that conclusion on the grounds that the mortgage was not really a mortgage in fee, but was in truth two mortgages—one on the life estate of the second earl, and one on the remainder of the appellant. Since the decision in A.-G. v. Beech (1) it cannot be denied that if tenant for life and remainderman in fee combine to sell settled property, it is thereby taken out of the settlement, and does not pass and is not to be deemed to pass on the death of the life tenant. And I think that the result must be the same if, instead of selling, they combine to create a mortgage in fee upon the settled property. Pro tanto the property is taken out of the settlement, and what passes on the death of the tenant for life is the equity of redemption only, and the benefit accruing or arising in that event is in that equity alone. In the present case the mortgage was antecedent to the settlement under which the appellant now claims title in remainder. But it is said that the conveyancing arrangements in the present case, by which the incumbrances on the life estate were purposely kept alive for the better security of the mortgagees, prevented any union of the life estate and remainder in them, and they were not mortgagees on the fee in possession during the second earl's lifetime. HENN COLLINS, L.J., said :

“It is the existence of this mortgage [on the life estate] so kept alive and determining, so far as it was a charge on the life estate, on the death of the second Earl Cowley, that is decisive in favour of the Crown in this case.”

With the most sincere respect for the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, I find myself unable to concur in this view, which seems to me to overlook the substance and real character of the transaction. The joint power created by the disentailing deed was the appropriate machinery for enabling the parties to make a conveyance of their respective interests by a simultaneous act, and so as to create one estate. By the exercise of that power a mortgage was created which was expressed to be and intended to be a mortgage on the fee, and in my opinion was a mortgage of the equitable fee, subject, of course, to all existing burdens. There was no intervening estate or interest which prevented a union in the appointees of whatever equitable estate was left in the life tenant (subject to the charges thereon) with the equitable estate in remainder of the appellant. The money due to the holders of the incumbrances effected by the second earl on his life estate was paid out of the mortgage money.

If the matter had rested there, or if the incumbrances had been left outstanding and undischarged, there could not, in my opinion, have been any question that a mortgage was created on the corpus of the property, subject to the subsisting charges created by the will of the first earl, and subject also, during the life of the second earl, to whatever prior incumbrances effected by him on his life estate were subsisting. But the incumbrances were assigned to the Prudential Co., and this is said to make all the difference, and to be decisive of the case. I am really unable to understand how or why the rights of the mortgagees conferred by the exercise of the power were altered, or (as is said) split into two mortgages; because by a conveyancing device they had also a collateral right, in case a mesne incumbrance turned up, to claim priority over it during the life of the second earl. I am, therefore, of opinion that the property in which the second earl had an interest ceasing with his death was the equity of redemption only, or (in other words) his interest was in the income of the estate after deduction of the interest on the Prudential Co.'s mortgage (laying aside the paramount charges); and the benefit which accrued or arose on the second earl's death under s. 2 (1) (b), if the case falls under that sub-section, was the principal value of that income only, or (shortly) the value of the equity of redemption.

All the learned judges in both courts below, except perhaps RIGBY, L.J., have agreed that s. 7 (1) applies only to the case of an estate passing from a deceased owner subject to his debts and incumbrances. That sub-section is not an easy one to construe, and I am not satisfied that I have quite mastered the meaning of it, but I do not think that it applies to the present case.

There is only one other point I wish to mention. The policies which formed part of the security of the incumbrancers on the life estate were assigned to trustees on trust to apply the proceeds on the death of the second earl in reduction of the Prudential Co.'s mortgage, and not, as A. L. SMITH, L.J., seems to have thought, to the Prudential Co. themselves. No claim to estate duty on the proceeds of the policies, or to deduct the proceeds of these policies from the mortgage debt, is made by the Attorney-General in this appeal, and no argument was addressed to your

A Lordships on the point. Consequently no opinion is expressed or implied on it in the decision of the case.

As to the other point—whether the appellant is entitled to any deduction in respect of the cesser of the rentcharge of £3,000 a year to which he was entitled during the second earl's lifetime—I agree with your Lordships that he is not entitled to that deduction, and I need not repeat the reasons which have been

B given.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C.—Before putting the question I think it right to add that my lamented friend LORD HERSCHELL authorised me to say that he concurred in the conclusion at which your Lordships have now arrived.

A charging order of a debtor's interest in a partnership under s. 23 of the Partnership Act, 1890, held not to be a "transaction" protected by s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now s. 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914] so as not to be invalidated in the case of the debtor's bankruptcy. Re O'Shea's Settlement, Courage v. O'Shea (1), [1895] 1 Ch. 325, applied.

H Where at the direction of the court money was paid into court in redemption of the interest charged the transaction was not a "completed execution" for the purposes of s. 45 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [now s. 40 of the 1914 Act] so as to prevent the money forming part of the bankrupt's estate.

Semble, that if the amount paid in had been paid direct to the execution creditor the execution would have been "complete."

Summons by the plaintiff, one Wild, the execution creditor, for an order that a sum of money paid into court in the following circumstances be paid out to him.

On April 20, 1896, the plaintiff obtained judgment in the Queen's Bench Division on a dishonoured cheque for £125 and costs against the defendant, William Southwood, and on April 27, he obtained a charging order for £147 8s. 6d. in respect of the judgment and costs on the defendant's share and interest in a business he was carrying on in partnership with two other persons. The two other partners were elected under s. 23 (3) of the Partnership Act, 1890, to redeem the interest charged and on June 2 an order was made that they pay into court the sum of £156 10s., the amount in respect of which the charging order had been made plus costs. The order was expressed to be without prejudice to the rights of the Official Receiver, or any other receiver appointed by the court, to whom the plaintiff was to give notice of any application for the payment of the money into court.

On May 23 when the plaintiff took out the summons to enforce his charging order he had been unaware of the fact that on April 17 the defendant had committed an act of bankruptcy. This act formed the ground of a bankruptcy petition which had been presented on June 1, and on which a receiving order was made on June 15. The summons for payment out of the money in court was taken out by the plaintiff on July 13.

By s. 23 of the Partnership Act, 1890 :

- “(1.) After the commencement of this Act a writ of execution shall not issue against any partnership property except on a judgment against the firm. (2.) The High Court, or any judge thereof, or the Chancery Court of the County Palatine of Lancaster, or a county court, may, on the application by summons of any judgment creditor of a partner, make an order charging that partner's interest in the partnership property and profits with payment of the amount of the judgment debt and interest thereon. . . . (3.) The other partner or partners shall be at liberty at any time to redeem the interest charged. . . .”

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 :

“Section 45.—(1.) Where a creditor has issued execution against the goods or lands of a debtor, or has attached any debt due to him, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution or attachment against the trustee in bankruptcy of the debtor, unless he has completed the execution or attachment before the date of the receiving order, and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition by or against the debtor, or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor. (2.) For the purposes of this Act, an execution against goods is completed by the seizure and sale; an attachment of a debt is completed by the receipt of the debt; and an execution against land is completed by seizure, or, in the case of an equitable interest, by the appointment of a receiver.

“Section 49. Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment, . . . nothing in this Act shall invalidate, in the case of a bankruptcy—(a) Any payment by the bankrupt to any of his creditors; (b) Any payment or delivery to the bankrupt; (c) Any conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable con-

A sideration; (d) Any contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration. Provided that both the following conditions are complied with, namely—(1.) The payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, as the case may be, takes place before the date of the receiving order; and (2.) The person (other than the debtor) to, by, or with whom the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction was made, executed, or entered into, has not at the time of the payment, delivery, conveyance, assignment, contract, dealing, or transaction, notice of any available act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before that time.”

C Hansell for the trustee in bankruptcy.

D VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—This is a summons on behalf of the plaintiff for an order for the payment out to him of the sum of £147 8s. 6d., paid into court under an order dated June 2, which was made under the following circumstances: [His LORDSHIP stated the facts of the case and continued:] I am of opinion that I ought not to make any order for the payment of this money out of court to the plaintiff. There was on April 17 an act of bankruptcy, and all the orders which have been made are subsequent to it. The plaintiff is an execution creditor, and in considering what were his rights as such, I will first deal with his rights irrespective of any protective enactments like s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. He had a right to seize the goods and property of the execution debtor, but he had no right against the property of any other person. The first step to execution was the summons which was issued on April 20, and this question, therefore, arises: Was the interest in the partnership property at that time the property of the judgment creditor? In my opinion, it was not. It had vested in the trustee of the defendant's bankruptcy owing to the relation back of the title of the trustee to the date of the act of bankruptcy. This law of relation back as from a date antecedent to the transaction without any petition in bankruptcy operates very hardly in many cases, and it is for this reason that protective sections have been inserted in many Acts of Parliament.

E But, apart from those sections, it is plain that this execution cannot hold good against the trustee in bankruptcy, on the ground that it was a seizure of property not belonging to the execution debtor. The protective section is s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; but the decision in Re O'Shea's Settlement, Courage v. O'Shea (1), which held that a charging order under s. 14 of the Judgments Act, 1838 [repealed], is not a protected transaction within that section, prevents the plaintiff from relying upon it. It has been said, however, that that decision was a decision on the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 14, and has no application to the case of a charging order under s. 23 of the Partnership Act, 1890. With that contention I do not agree. In both cases the obtaining of a charging order is a proceeding, and cannot be called a transaction within the meaning of s. 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

F With regard to s. 45 of the same Act, if it is a protective section, the decision in Courage v. O'Shea (1) deprives the execution creditor of its benefit, and if it is a restrictive section, the question does not arise.

I It remains for me to deal with the argument that this money never formed part of the estate of the trustee in bankruptcy. The Partnership Act, 1890, gives to the continuing partners the right to buy out the claims of an execution creditor against the interest of their late partner in the partnership property. They might in this case have paid the amount to the execution creditor direct, and I do not say what would have been the effect if this money had been paid out of court to the execution creditor. I think he would have completed his execution, and would have obtained a good title to the money; but that is not a point I have to decide. In my judgment, this money which has been paid into court is just as much the proceeds of the goods and property of the bankrupt as if his goods had been sold, and that, as the judgment debtor's interest in the partnership property had passed to his trustee in bankruptcy, this money formed part of the trustee's estate. A Master and Servant—Wrongful dismissal—Damages—Employment by partners for fixed term—Dissolution of partnership before expiration of term—Willingness of remaining partners to continue employment.

The four defendants, who were in partnership, agreed to employ the plaintiff as manager of one of their offices for two years. Before the expiration of that period, the partnership was voluntarily dissolved by the retirement of two of the partners, the business being carried on by the other two partners, who were willing to continue to employ the plaintiff for the remainder of the two years on the same terms as before. The plaintiff declined to do so and brought an action for, inter alia, wrongful dismissal against the defendants. F

Held (LORD ESHER, M.R., dissenting): the dissolution of the partnership operated as a wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff, but he was only entitled to nominal damages. G

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of WRIGHT, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

D In 1892, the four defendants, Calder, Alexander, Macdonald and Brown, were carrying on business in partnership as whisky merchants in Scotland and London. On Dec. 23, 1892, an agreement in writing was entered into by the plaintiff with the defendants by which they agreed to employ him as manager of their office in London. By that agreement it was agreed that the plaintiff should, during the term of two years from Nov. 1, 1892, be the manager of the office part of the business of Scotch whisky merchants then being carried on by the employers in the city of London, and should receive for his services the salary of £300 a year, paid monthly. By cl. 5, the defendants were to be at liberty to terminate the agreement at any time during the period of two years on giving to the plaintiff one calendar month's previous notice in writing of their desire so to do, but should in such case pay to the plaintiff a sum equivalent to the salary he would have received if he had been retained as manager for the full period of two years. On May 6, E 1893, the partnership between the four defendants was voluntarily dissolved by the retirement of two of them, but the business continued to be carried on under the same firm name by the two remaining partners. The plaintiff, in ignorance of the change in the partnership, continued for two months to serve as manager. In July, 1893, the continuing partners gave notice to the plaintiff of the change that had taken place in the firm, and offered to continue him in their employ at the same salary as that which had been agreed to in December, 1892. The plaintiff thereupon G refused to act as manager for the transferees of the business, and brought this action for wrongful dismissal or, alternatively, for damages for breach of contract. WRIGHT, J., gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

I May 30, 1895. LORD ESHER, M.R. In this case the plaintiff had entered into a contract with the four defendants, who were then in partnership, to serve them in their business for a term of two years. Before the expiration of the term the partnership was dissolved by the retirement of two of the partners. The two partners who continued the business offered to keep the plaintiff in their employ at the same rate of wages as he had been receiving before, but he refused. He clearly had a perfect right to refuse to serve the new firm. He then brought this action, which, it is agreed, is for a wrongful dismissal. It was also suggested that a question arises whether the action ought not to be for a breach of the contract to employ him for two years. He did serve for about two months after the date on which he claims to have been dismissed, and no wages have been paid him for that period, but, as that matter is one which has not been raised in this action, it is unnecessary that I should say more about it.

As to the claim for wrongful dismissal, the defendants never assumed to dismiss the plaintiff. The old firm merely ceased to carry on business. The business now being carried on is carried on by a new firm. The question, therefore, is this : does the ceasing to carry on the business constitute a wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff? In my opinion it does not, and I think that the law has been so laid down over and over again. The defendants simply ceased to carry on business; they did not dismiss the plaintiff. They did not bind themselves by their agreement with him that they would continue to carry on their business in partnership for two years. Certainly there is no express stipulation in the agreement to that effect, and, in my opinion, no such stipulation can be implied, because it is not perfectly clear that it was understood by both parties that every reasonable man who bound himself by a contract for service for a fixed period would do so on such terms. It is not true to say that every reasonable man would bind himself to carry on his business at a loss rather than dismiss a servant. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff cannot succeed on a claim for wrongful dismissal. A B C

Then it was said that there was a breach of the contract to employ him for two years, and that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on that ground. If he were entitled to succeed on that ground, the damages would, prima facie, be obviously very considerable. But the probability of his getting other employment for the rest of the two years would have to be taken into consideration, and, in the present case, the plaintiff could obviously have got it. The same employment as he had lost was offered to him by the two partners who constitute the new firm. Therefore, the damages in this case could only be nominal. But, in my opinion, there has not been any breach of contract. The contract was only to employ him in the business carried on by the four partners. As I have said, there is no contract by them that they will continue to carry on that business for two years. The breach alleged is that they did not carry it on; but if, as I think, they never agreed to carry it on, it follows that there is no breach. Their real agreement was to employ the plaintiff for two years, if they continued to carry on business for that period. The payment to him for his services is not a lump sum; he is to be paid wages monthly. D E F

In my opinion, the plaintiff has no cause of action, either for wrongful dismissal or for breach of contract, and I think that the defendants are entitled to judgment, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—In my opinion, it is important to consider the terms of the agreement of Dec. 23, 1892. If, in pursuance of cl. 5 of that agreement, the defendants had given to the plaintiff one calendar month's notice in writing of their desire to terminate the agreement, he would then have been entitled to the whole salary for the agreed term of two years. But what happened was that, before the expiration of the two years, two of the partners retired from the business, and the plaintiff, in ignorance of what had happened, continued to act as manager for a short time afterwards—namely, up to July, 1893. The two partners who now carry on the business that belonged to the four defendants are willing to keep on the plaintiff on the terms of the agreement of Dec. 23, 1892. The question is : what was the effect of the dissolution of partnership by the retirement of two of the partners? There is authority to show that the dissolution put an end to the agreement for the employment of the plaintiff, unless the agreement contained some stipulation to the contrary : see Tasker v. Shepherd (1), and Hoey v. MacEwan and Auld (2). It was expressly stated in Tasker v. Shepherd (1) that the death of a partner would put an end to an agreement for personal service; and the present case, where the partnership was voluntarily dissolved, seems to me to be a stronger one. Therefore, in my opinion, the dissolution operated either as a wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff or as a breach of contract. There is no stipulation in the agreement that shows any intention of the parties that this should not be so. The agreement was to last for a fixed term of two years, and the clause as to the defendants' power of dismissal on one month's notice shows strongly that the employment was intended by both G H I

A parties to be for two years. The plaintiff was discharged in May, 1893, and, subject to what I am about to say, he would be entitled to his salary for the remaining part of the two years from Nov. 1, 1892. The continuing partners, however, are willing to keep on the plaintiff in their employ on the terms of the agreement of Dec. 23, 1892, and, therefore, if the plaintiff has suffered any loss by the breach of contract it is his own fault. He is, therefore, entitled only to nominal damages, B because he has not in fact suffered any loss at all. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment and the appeal will be allowed, but without costs.

RIGBY, L.J., read the following judgment.—In this case, the plaintiff entered into an agreement on Dec. 23, 1892, with the defendants, who were then partners in C a business of whisky dealers, to act as their agent for a term of two years from Nov. 1 of that year at a fixed salary of £300 a year, and there was a clause entitling the employers to determine the agreement altogether before the expiration of the two years on giving a month's notice and paying the unpaid amount of his agreed salary for the unexpired residue of the two years' term. If that clause had been acted on, the agreement would have been brought entirely to an end, and the plaintiff would have had no cause of complaint. What took place was, that, before the D expiration of the two years' term—that is to say, on May 6, 1893—the partnership between the four defendants was put an end to, and the business transferred to two of them, who continued to carry on a business under the same firm name. No notice of this dissolution of partnership was given to the plaintiff, and he continued to act as agent in the business as he had done before, until the end of July, 1893. In a E letter of July 26, from the firm of Alexander and Macdonald, which was the old firm's name, to the plaintiff, mention is made of a transfer of the firm's business. In a reply of July 28, the plaintiff says that he shall be glad to hear in regard to himself as he cannot be handed over as a chattel, and adds that the contract was with certain individuals, none of whom he can release from their obligation until the conditions of their contract with him are fulfilled. On July 29, the firm write to F the plaintiff, giving express notice of the retirement of two of the defendants from the partnership, and the plaintiff replies by stating that he has not consented to transfer his contract from its original subscribers in any way. Further correspondence then took place, in which the two transferees of the business insisted on their right to the services of the plaintiff under the agreement of Dec. 23, whilst the plaintiff refused to recognise their right to claim such services, and declined to G act as the agent of the two transferees.

The question now arises as to the rights, if any, of the plaintiff. Numerous cases were cited with reference to the construction of the agreement; but, in the result, I am of opinion that the only principle to be derived from them is that the contract is to be construed according to its express terms, and that no term is to be implied which is not rendered reasonably necessary to carry out the plain intention of the H parties. In accordance with this principle, it seems to me impossible to imply a term that the partnership business shall be conducted by its partners during the two years' term. On the other hand, I think it equally impossible to imply a term that the employers may get rid of their contract by a simple dissolution of partnership, or that the contract implies that, in the event of the retirement of any of the employers, which retirement altogether puts an end to the existing partnership, the I defendants' contract may be transferred to the new partnership formed to continue the business. A contract to serve four employers cannot, without express language, be construed as being a contract to serve two of them. In my judgment, the dissolution of the partnership operated as a dismissal of the plaintiff not authorised by law. The clause as to dismissal on a month's notice not having been acted on, the plaintiff cannot recover as liquidated damages the unpaid part of his salary for the two years' term; on the other hand, the defendants are liable to him for the usual damages for a dismissal without due cause. The plaintiff brought his action on Dec. 22, 1893, before the two years' term came to an end.

In my judgment, the defendants are entitled in mitigation of damages to put forward the offer of an engagement on the same terms made by the continuing partners. I see nothing in the evidence to show that this in a pecuniary sense would have been of a less value to him than his engagement to serve the four defendants. So far it would seem that the plaintiff's damages would be nominal. But, as he actually continued to render services until the end of July, and his salary was only paid to the end of May, I am of opinion that he would be entitled to two months' salary at the rate of £300 a year—that is to say, to £50. But that question was not raised in this action. I, therefore, concur in the view of LOPES, L.J., that the appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiff for nominal damages without costs either here or in the court below.

While the defendants' omnibus was being driven by their servant, a police inspector, being of the opinion that the driver was drunk, ordered him to discontinue driving. The omnibus was then about a quarter of a mile from the defendants' yard. The driver authorised a by-stander, whom he knew but who was not a driver, to drive the omnibus to the defendants' yard. That person drove negligently and injured the plaintiff.

Held: as the driver could have communicated with the defendants, there was no evidence of such a necessity as to constitute him an agent of necessity and justify him in handing over the omnibus to a third person to drive it to the yard, and, therefore, the defendants were not liable for the third person's negligence.

Boydell Houghton for the plaintiff.

C LORD ESHER, M.R.—A question of great importance has been raised in this case, whether a servant can, in a case of necessity, delegate his authority to another person and so make his master liable for the negligence of that person in carrying out the servant's duties. That question we have not now to decide. A servant employed for a particular purpose clearly cannot delegate his duty to anyone else unless, possibly, in cases of necessity. The question for our decision is not what will happen, assuming that there is a case of necessity; it is, whether there was any evidence before the county court judge on which he could reasonably find that a necessity existed for the driver of the omnibus to delegate his duty to Veares. I do not think that the county court judge has found that any case of necessity existed. He seems to have said that the facts found by him raised in law an inference that a necessity existed. But I will assume that he has in his judgment found that there was a necessity.

E The question for us to consider is, whether there was any evidence on which he could reasonably find that. Has a servant power to delegate his authority without first consulting his master? If a servant has an opportunity of consulting his master, there can be no need for him to act on his own view of affairs. The facts of this case are that there was an omnibus in the street, the driver being incapacitated through the orders of the police from driving it, and the yard of the driver's master being only a quarter of a mile away. Could not the omnibus have been left in reasonable safety to stand in the street while someone was sent to the yard to ask the master what was the best thing to do? It is obvious that the omnibus might well have been left where it was while the owner was being communicated with as to what should be done. Then the judge, if sitting with a jury, should have directed them that there was no evidence of any necessity justifying any delegation of authority, or, if sitting without a jury, he should have held that there was no necessity for the driver to act without first communicating with his master. The question for the Divisional Court was whether there was any such evidence. In my opinion, there was no evidence on which it can be said that a necessity arose for the driver to act without first communicating with his master.

G I may add that I strongly agree with what was said by PARKE, B., in Hawtayne v. Bourne (1) and EYRE, C.J., in Nicholson v. Chapman (2), that the implied authority of a servant to act according to the necessity of a case is confined to certain well-known instances, such as that of a master of a ship, and the acceptor of a bill of exchange for the honour of the drawer, and in salvage cases. These cases are all exceptions from the general rule.

I A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Harrison was sent out by his master as driver of an omnibus, and, while driving, was ordered by a police inspector to get down from the box. Harrison then authorised Veares, whom he knew but who was not a coachman, to get up and drive the omnibus home. Veares drove the omnibus back to the yard, but drove so negligently as to knock down and injure the plaintiff, who has now brought an action against the defendants. The question is whether the defendants are liable for the negligence of Veares.

The ordinary rule is that a master is only liable for the negligence of his servant while acting within the scope of his employment. The question in this case, therefore, seems to be whether it was within the scope of Harrison's authority to put up Veares to drive the omnibus home under the circumstances which had happened. That question is prima facie capable of only one answer. It is not within the scope of a coachman's authority to put up someone else on to the box to drive for him. It is a coachman's duty to drive personally. But then it is said that circumstances may exist under which a coachman may be constituted an agent of necessity. It may be that such circumstances might arise constituting a servant an agent of necessity, but I think that they must be such that the servant is unable to communicate with his master and obtain from him instructions how to act. A master of a ship, it has been said, is not to delay for instructions where delay would be clearly imprudent. But, if there is a fair expectation of obtaining directions, either from the owners of the goods or from agents known by the master to have authority to deal with the goods, within such a time as would not be imprudent, the master of the ship must make every reasonable endeavour to get those directions; and his authority to sell does not arise until he has failed to get them. It is true that, in the present case, we have no specific findings on this point by the county court judge, but in his judgment he said that it was "clearly necessary that someone should drive the omnibus home," but he does not say that it was necessary that Harrison should immediately appoint someone to drive it back. It seems to me that there is no evidence on which he could find that Harrison became an agent of necessity. The police ordered Harrison to cease driving when the omnibus was only a quarter of a mile from the defendants' yard, and, therefore, there was obviously a possibility of communicating with them for the purpose of obtaining directions from them as to what they wished done. Harrison was not constituted an agent of necessity, and, as the putting up of Veares to drive in his place was not within the scope of the authority given him by his master, the defendants are not responsible for the results of Veares' negligence.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Certain facts have been found by the county court judge, but there is no evidence of any such necessity as would be required by law to enable the driver and the conductor of an omnibus to employ someone else to drive it under the circumstances that existed in this case. No case can be cited in point, unless necessity be first proved; and, for the reasons that have been given, I agree that no necessity has been shown to have existed here.

Charity—Benefit to community—Gift “to encourage the sport of yacht racing.”

By his will, dated October, 1894, a testator, who died in December, 1894, bequeathed a sum of money to trustees in trust to purchase annually a cup to be given to the most successful racing yacht of the season, declaring that his object in giving the cup was “to encourage the sport of yacht racing.”

Held: the object of the gift was a sport primarily calculated to promote the amusement of individuals, rather than that of the community at large, and thus the gift could not be said to be charitable, but was void for perpetuity.

Notes. By the Recreational Charities Act, 1958, s. 1 (38 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 122) certain trusts for the provision of “facilities for recreation or other leisure-time occupation” are declared to be charitable “if the facilities are provided in the interests of social welfare.” However the trusts must still be for the public benefit to be charitable and in the present case it was held that the trust was not for the benefit of the community at large. It is therefore not affected by the Act.

I

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., reported [1895] 2 Ch. 649, that a bequest to encourage yacht racing was not charitable and therefore void for perpetuity.

The testator, Charles George Nottage, by his will, declared as follows:

“I bequeath to the Yacht Racing Association of Great Britain, out of such part of my estate as may be legally bequeathed for such a purpose, the sum of £2,000, the same to be invested in the names of three trustees to be appointed by the council of the said association, and to be invested in the debenture bonds or debenture stock of any railway in the United States of America paying at the time of investment not less than 4 per cent. per annum upon the amount invested, but so that not more than one-fourth of the capital shall be invested at the same time in the same security, or in such other securities as the trustees so to be appointed as aforesaid shall deem expedient. And I direct that the trustees so to be appointed as aforesaid shall, out of the annual income of the trust fund, purchase annually a cup to be called 'The Nottage Cup,' which is to be given to the most successful yacht of the season of over 19 rating, or what may in future be held to be the equivalent of that rating; and the council of the said association shall decide annually which yacht has in their opinion the best claim to the cup, and in the event of there being any difference of opinion the vote of the majority of the said council is to decide the question; or the said council may, if they think fit, order the said cup to be specially raced for. My object in giving this cup is to encourage the sport of yacht racing, and I declare that, in the event of the Yacht Racing Association being dissolved, or ceasing to exist, the trustees of the said fund shall pay and make over the same to three trustees to be appointed by the council or committee of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, by whom the said fund shall be held upon similar trusts to those hereinbefore declared with regard to the purchase of a cup to be called 'The Nottage Cup.' "

An originating summons was taken out by the trustees and executors of the will against the Yacht Racing Association of Great Britain and other persons beneficially interested under the will to determine the question (inter alia) whether the above-mentioned bequest was valid. The summons was adjourned into court, and on May 23, 1895, came on to be heard before KEKEWICH, J., who decided that the bequest being remotely and not directly beneficial to the community, was not charitable, and was therefore void for perpetuity. From that decision the defendants, the Yacht Racing Association of Great Britain, now appealed.

Warrington, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker for the defendants.

Pattullo for the residuary legatees.

J. G. Fawcus for the trustees and executors of the will.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We are all quite aware of the extreme difficulty of drawing a line between gifts which are charitable in the sense in which lawyers use that term—that is to say, in a very wide sense—and gifts which are not; but this is really a new experiment. The testator here tells us exactly what he has in mind. This is an institution of members for mere sport—it is a mere game; the testator treats it so, and he tells us so himself. At the end of the bequest he says: "My object in giving this cup is to encourage the sport of yacht racing." Taking a wide view I should say that, in my opinion, every healthy sport is good for the nation. I do not draw much distinction between cricket, football, fencing, yachting, or anything else. If that were a lawyer's idea of a charity, this would not have been the first time we should have heard of it, and I cannot find any case which tends that way—that is to say, any case which would authorise us in saying that a mere legacy to promote a game or a sport is a charitable legacy within the extended doctrine of the Court of Chancery. I find it very difficult to draw the line, and I do not attempt to draw the line. It is a case in which it is exceedingly difficult to do it. The cases in the books show that sometimes there is a case a little on one side, and sometimes a little on the other of the line. But I deal with the present case on the broad ground that I am not aware of any authority which warrants the inference that a legacy for the encouragement of a mere sport is a charitable gift. I think that is enough to decide this case. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—It is indeed most difficult to draw a line in this matter, but probably the safest way to deal with this case will be to say, what does not come within the definition of a charitable gift. I am clearly of opinion that a gift, the object of which is a mere sport or game which is primarily calculated to promote

A the amusement of individuals as distinguished from the community at large, upon the authorities cannot be said to be a charitable gift. If we were so to hold, we should indeed open a very wide door, because, if we were to hold that this is a charitable gift, I should feel very great difficulty in saying that a gift for the purpose of promoting bicycling, cricket, football, lawn tennis, or any other game you like to name, would not come within the same category. All those sports are

B calculated to promote the health, physique, and good constitution of the community at large. But legacies to encourage them are not of that kind which can be said to be charitable gifts.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I daresay it is impossible, and certainly it would not be advisable, to define in general words what is a charitable

C bequest. One must always go back to the analogy of the statute, and that is the only test which has ever really been applied. If this could succeed—if the gift of a fund to found a prize for yacht racing could succeed—it must be on the ground that it is a general public purpose. I know no other head under which it could come. I think the very terms of the will itself explain that. The Yacht Racing Association is spoken of as an association of yacht owners; and the prizes are to be won by the

D owners of the yachts. I think, however much we might favour the sport of yachting, we cannot go to the extent of saying that it is a general public purpose. There are a great many things which are highly laudable, and in many ways very useful, which are yet not charities within the meaning of the statute, and in my opinion this is one of them.

Where a third party claims goods seized in execution against a debtor, but no return has been made by the sheriff and an interpleader summons is taken out, a bankruptcy notice subsequently served by a petitioning creditor will be bad

I as it can only demand what a creditor can enforce by execution and the petitioning creditor is not in a position to issue execution.

Appeal from a decision of the registrar of the Birmingham County Court making a receiving order against the debtor.

The debtor was a farmer, and was tenant to a landlord named Mr. Grove who, on Mar. 23, 1895, obtained judgment against him, under Ord. 14, for the sum of £89 16s. 9d. for rent due, etc. On Mar. 27, the sheriff levied execution on the debtor's goods for the amount of the debt. On April 9 the goods were sold, and realised £42 gross and £29 16s. 9d. net. On April 22 the landlord, as petitioning creditor, issued a bankruptcy notice for the whole sum of £89 16s. 9d. A claim having been made to the proceeds of the sale of the goods, the sheriff, on April 26, took out an interpleader summons. On April 29 the bankruptcy notice was served, and on April 30 an issue was ordered to be tried on the interpleader summons, the sheriff to retain the proceeds of sale to abide the result. A petition was presented against the debtor, alleging the debt to be £84 10s., and the act of bankruptcy to be non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice. On May 27 a receiving order was made against the debtor by the registrar of the Birmingham County Court. On June 19 the interpleader issue was heard, and judgment was given for the petitioning creditor. The debtor appealed against the decision of the registrar making the receiving order.

Muir Mackenzie for the petitioning creditor.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—One ground of appeal in this case was that no act of bankruptcy had been committed on which a receiving order could be made; the act of bankruptcy alleged was non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice. By s. 4 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 :

“A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy. . . . (g) If a creditor has obtained a final judgment against him for any amount, and execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England, or by leave of the court elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act, requiring him to pay the judgment debt in accordance with the terms of the judgment, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the court, and he does not, within seven days after service of the notice in case the service is effected in England, and in case the service effected elsewhere then within the time limited in that behalf by the order giving leave to effect the service, either comply with the requirements of the notice, or satisfy the court that he has a counterclaim, set-off, or cross demand which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained.”

That being the section, the facts are as follows. Judgment was obtained for £89 16s. 9d. against the debtor, and a fi. fa. was delivered to the sheriff for execution, and on Mar. 27 the sheriff levied and sold the debtor's goods and realised the sum of £29 16s. A claim was made to the goods the exact date of which was not given,

A but it is a reasonable inference that the sheriff did not at once make a return to the writ and pay over the amount realised. On April 26 an interpleader summons was taken out by the sheriff, a bankruptcy notice having been issued on April 22. It followed from these dates that when the bankruptcy notice had been issued a fi. fa. had been placed in the sheriff's hands and a levy had been made, but no return. The date of the service of the bankruptcy notice was on April 29 and so
B after the issue of the interpleader summons. In my judgment, it followed from these facts and dates that on the date of the issue of the bankruptcy notice, and also at the date of the service of it, the execution creditor was not in a position to issue execution for the £89 16s. 9d. Up to the date of the issue of the bankruptcy notice he was not in a position to issue execution, because execution had been issued and no return made; and according to the common law you can only issue a
C second fi. fa. after a previous one if a return has been made to the first one, and this had not been made, as the second must recite the amount realised by the first.

It seems to me also that at the date of the service of the bankruptcy notice the execution creditor could not issue execution for the whole amount for the same reason, as there had been no return to the writ, and also because at the date of the service of the bankruptcy notice there was already the interpleader summons in
D existence. That such a summons had been issued brings the case within the principles of Re Ford, Ex parte Ford (1) and Re Phillips, Ex parte Phillips (2). If it is correct that no execution could issue for the whole amount of the debt, it seems to me that the bankruptcy notice which gave the debtor notice to pay the whole amount of the debt was bad, not on the ground of any right to stay of execution—
E and I do not say that there are any words in the section that the bankruptcy notice shall not issue under these circumstances—but on the plain intention of the Act of Parliament, i.e., that a bankruptcy notice shall only demand what a creditor can enforce by execution. It was conceded that, if part of the judgment debt had been paid, the execution creditor could not levy execution or issue a bankruptcy notice for more than was due. Under these circumstances, in order to decide this
F case, it is enough to say that at the moment of the issue of the bankruptcy notice there was no right to issue execution for £89 16s. 9d.

The question might have been raised as to whether there was a matter for amendment. If one takes the view of MATHEW, J., in Re Bates, Ex parte Lindsey (3), there is strong ground for saying that this was a good ground for amendment. If, however, one takes the view of CAVE, J., in Re Phillips (2), then there was no
G ground for amendment. But we have not to decide this question, as counsel for the petitioning creditor declined to ask for leave to amend. The question then is, Can a bankruptcy notice issue for a sum for which execution cannot issue? The answer is, it cannot; and when once you arrive at that conclusion then the only question is, could execution have been issued at the date of the issue of the bankruptcy notice or at the date of its service for the whole amount of the debt? It is
H clear it could not, for you must deduct the £29.

WRIGHT, J.—I desire to express no opinion on the general question whether a bankruptcy notice can be issued when execution has been issued and not perfected by a return being made to the writ.

Re CROWTHER. MIDGLEY v. CROWTHER

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Chitty, J.), May 1, 1895]

Executor—Powers—Power to postpone sale—Testator's businesses—Power to postpone for "as long as shall seem expedient"—Income pending such sale or conversion to be paid to the testator's widow and children—Business carried on for twenty-two years—Profits claimed by testator's grandson as accretion to capital.

The testator devised and bequeathed his two businesses to trustees upon trusts for sale and conversion, the proceeds to be invested and to be held upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death for his children. The testator empowered the trustees to postpone the sale "for such period as to them shall seem expedient," the income until sale or conversion to be paid to the persons who would be entitled under the will to the proceeds or income thereof if such sale and conversion had actually taken place. The testator's businesses were carried on for twenty-two years, until the death of his widow, and the profits thereof had been paid to her as annual income. The plaintiff, a grandchild of the testator, entitled to a share of capital, claimed that the businesses ought to have been sold within a reasonable time after the testator's death, and that the profits of the businesses, less 4 per cent. per annum, should be brought into account as part of the capital.

Held: the trustees were justified in carrying on the businesses and paying the whole income to the tenant for life.

Action brought by the plaintiff, a grandchild of the testator, claiming that profits from two businesses carried on by the testator's trustees for the benefit of his widow for twenty-two years after his death should be brought into account as part of the capital of the testator's estate.

Byrne, Q.C., and Tanner for the plaintiff.

Farwell, Q.C., and J. G. Wood for the defendants.

CHITTY, J.—The executors and trustees of the testator's will, of whom his widow was one, carried on the testator's business of a general shopkeeper, to which he was entitled at his death, and also a rope and twine manufacturing business, to which he had been entitled in partnership with his son, Thomas Crowther, one of the defendants, from the year 1872—the date of the testator's death—to 1894, when the widow died. This action is brought by a grandchild of the testator, and the only point now raised by the plaintiff relates to the profits of these two businesses, the plaintiff claiming that all profits beyond 4 per cent. should be brought into account as part of the capital of the testator's estate. The question I have to decide is, whether the executors and trustees were authorised, on the

A construction of this will, in carrying on these businesses as they did for a period of nearly twenty-two years.

After the usual trusts for conversion and investment, the testator gives his son—the defendant Thomas Crowther—an option to purchase either of these businesses, which was never exercised, during the period I have mentioned; and then he empowers his trustees—and it is upon this power that the question turns—to postpone the sale and conversion of his estate, or any part thereof, “for such period as to them shall seem expedient”; and he directs that, until such sale, the income arising therefrom “shall belong to the person who would be entitled under the trust hereinbefore contained to the moneys arising from such sale and conversion, or the income arising therefrom if such sale and conversion had actually taken place.”

It is said by the plaintiff that the trustees have committed a breach of trust in carrying on these businesses under this power, though it is not suggested that the value of the businesses has decreased, or any loss been thereby occasioned to the estate; and it has been argued that this power to postpone conversion does not mean, as the testator says, that these trustees may postpone “for such period as to them shall seem expedient,” but that some limitation must be imposed on this period—a limitation arising, in the language of the Court of Appeal, in Re Norrington, Brindley v. Partridge (1), out of an artificial rule laid down by the Court of Chancery, which, according to the plaintiff’s argument, is, that the trustees may postpone for such period as they deem expedient, “provided such postponement is only made with a view to a subsequent sale,” or something to that effect.

It seems extraordinary that there should be any such arbitrary rule compelling me to insert such additional words in the testator’s will, and I fail to find any authority for it. When the estate becomes divisible, the power to postpone ceases, and comes to an end of itself; but when the power is existing, why it should not be read so as to justify the trustees in carrying on the testator’s business, if they think right to do so, I am at a loss to understand. I take it to be an unanswerable proposition that a power to postpone the sale of a business involves a power of carrying on the business until sale. Thus, in Re Chancellor, Chancellor v. Brown (2), COTTON, L.J., says (26 Ch.D. at p. 46):

“Without impugning any of the authorities that have been referred to, there is in this will an implied authority to the trustees to carry on the business, and the testator has said how the profits of the business, pending a sale, are to be paid and applied.”

So here, as long as the trustees carry on the business under this implied power, the language of the will is unmistakable. The income, or yearly profit, derived from the businesses is annual income for all the purposes of the will, and passes, under the words of the will, to the tenant for life. To hold otherwise would be to invent a trap to catch unwary trustees. There is nothing in any of the authorities that have been cited which compels me to come to such a conclusion; and some of the observations, indeed, in Re Chancellor (2) are quite opposed to the plaintiff’s contention, though in that case it was only necessary to consider whether the postponement of the sale for some two years was justified. The Court of Appeal held that it was. In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiff’s contention fails.

Bankruptcy—Administration of estate of person dying insolvent—Claim by widow for money lent for husband's trade—Applicability of bankruptcy law—Insolvency—Ascertainment—Inclusion of cost of administration.

When a deceased husband's estate is being administered in the Chancery Division, there are not sufficient assets to pay the creditors in full, and the widow claims in the administration against the estate of her husband in respect of money lent by her to him for the purposes of his trade, the rule which applies in bankruptcy as to the wife's proof in such circumstances is to be followed.

In ascertaining whether the deceased husband's estate could pay his liabilities in full the costs of administration are to be added to the other liabilities.

Appeal from a decision of the Chancellor of the county palatine of Durham.

The testator, George Leng, who was a farmer, died on March 15, 1893, and by his will he appointed his niece, the defendant, Jane Raine Emmerson, sole executrix, and devised to her the whole of his real and personal estate absolutely for her own benefit. The plaintiff was a creditor of the testator in respect of a claim for £100 on a promissory note, and she instituted this action on behalf of herself and all other creditors. The testator's widow claimed to prove as a creditor for the sum of £181 7s. 6d., which she alleged she had lent to the testator for payment of rent, wages of labourers, and other farming expenses. The widow's claim was disputed by the defendant, and was ultimately allowed by the registrar at £71 3s., which, together with taxed costs for proving same and interest, amounted to £105 16s. 8d. On the action coming on before the registrar for further consideration the plaintiff's solicitors raised the objection on behalf of the creditors that the estate was insolvent, and that, therefore, the widow's claim was, by the joint effect of s. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and of s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, liable to be postponed to the claims of all other creditors for value. The widow contended that the estate at the testator's death was solvent, and would still be so but for the costs of the action; and that, though s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, specially mentioned the costs of winding-up a company, there was no such reference to the costs of an administration suit, and the section, therefore, could not apply. The registrar decided that the widow's claim must be postponed, and that s. 10 of the Act of 1875 applied, because the question was not one as between secured and unsecured creditors, but was one of a debt or liability provable. On appeal the Chancellor of the County Palatine of Durham upheld the decision of the registrar. From the Chancellor's decision the widow appealed.

H Mar. 11, 1895. LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment, in which LORD HALSBURY concurred : This case turns on the combined effect of s. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875. Section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act is curiously framed. It provides :

I "Any money . . . of the wife lent . . . by her to her husband for the purpose of any trade or business carried on by him . . . shall be treated as assets of her husband's estate in the case of his bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the amount . . . of such money . . . after, but not before, all claims of the other creditors of the husband for valuable consideration . . . have been satisfied."

Money lent always becomes the property of the borrower as soon as he gets it. The money is his, although he owes money to the same amount with or without interest as the case may be. The section, nevertheless, first of all makes money lent or entrusted by a wife to her husband for the purposes of his trade his assets in the event of his bankruptcy. This, I suppose, is intended to be a qualification of the previous s. 2, which, as regards property, treats a married woman as feme sole. The qualification, however, is not general, but is confined to the case of her husband's bankruptcy, by which is meant when he has been adjudicated. If the section had stopped there the wife would have had no claim against the assets of her bankrupt husband even after payment of his other creditors; her assets would have to be treated in bankruptcy as his. To prevent this, words are added to preserve her rights when all his creditors for money or money's worth are paid. Subject to their payment she may claim a dividend as a creditor. But she can claim nothing in the bankruptcy until after payment of all her husbands' other creditors. In other words, in bankruptcy she has no provable debt until her husband's other creditors are paid. This is the short effect of the section, although it is most awkwardly expressed. Re Genese, Ex parte District Bank of London (1) is quite in accordance with this view. It was there held that a wife could not prove against her husband's estate until his other creditors had been paid 20s. in the pound.

I pass now to the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, which provides :

“ . . . in the administration by the court of the assets of any person . . . whose estate may prove to be insufficient for the payment in full of his debts and liabilities . . . the same rules shall prevail . . . as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors, and as to debts and liabilities provable, and as to the valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities, respectively, as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt . . . ”

Few sections in the Judicature Act have created more difficulty than this, but certain points are now settled. It is settled that the rules in bankruptcy which increase a bankrupt's assets—e.g., the reputed ownership clause, the fraudulent preference clause, and the sections which defeat certain settlements and executions—do not apply to the administration in Chancery of the assets of a deceased person. Those assets must be ascertained by applying the general laws of property and not the special rules applicable only to cases of bankruptcy. The authorities for this proposition are Re Withernsea Brickworks (2), which was followed in Re Maggi (3), and Pratt v. Inman (4): see also Re Baker (5). Two further rules have been settled, viz., first, that the common law right of an executor or administrator to retain a debt due to himself is not affected by s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875: Re Neville, Lee v. Nuttall (6); Re May (7); secondly, that this section has not deprived judgment creditors of their right to be paid in priority to other creditors in an administration action, although they have no priority in bankruptcy: see Smith v. Morgan (8); and Re Maggi (3).

In Re Maggi (3), FRY, L.J., came to this conclusion. But in commenting on s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, he seems to have overlooked the words “as to debts and liabilities provable,” and he considered that s. 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, which enacted that subject to certain specified exceptions all debts should in bankruptcy be paid pari passu, was not made applicable to administration actions. No doubt, if that section were held applicable in all cases, it would exclude the right of an executor to retain his own debt and would deprive judgment creditors of their priority. But these persons are entitled to preference on grounds peculiar to themselves, and the rules which favour them are rather exceptions to ordinary rules as to payment of debts than illustrations of those rules. While I recognise the exceptions, I cannot myself go so far as to say that the general rule in bankruptcy which requires debts (with some exceptions) to be paid pari passu is not applicable in administration actions where the estate being administered is insolvent. Whether debts entitled to priority in bankruptcy are to be treated as entitled to similar priority in administering the assets of a deceased insolvent was a question on which decisions were conflicting: cf. Re Albion Steel and Wire Co. (9) and Re Land Financiers Association (10). All doubt on this point was, however, removed by s. 1 (6) of the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888

Construing s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, by the decisions and by the express provision of s. 1 (6) of the Act of 1888, the rules in bankruptcy as to debts and liabilities provable must now, I think, include all rules as to priorities expressly enacted by any statute and made applicable in the event of bankruptcy. The priority conferred in the case of bankruptcy by the Married Women's Property Act, s. 3, must therefore, in my opinion, be treated as imported by s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, into the administration of the estates of deceased insolvents. It was urged that the last part of s. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act was only a qualification of the first part, and that, as the first part of the section does not affect debts provable, but relates only to what are to be treated as assets, that part of the section is not one of the rules in bankruptcy to which s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, applies, and that consequently the second part, which is in effect a proviso to the first, cannot be regarded as one of such rules. I confess that I was at first disposed to think this view correct, but on reflection I cannot adopt it. If we were to accede to this argument we should be attaching too much weight to the first part of the section and too little to the second part, and we should miss the true meaning of the section as a whole. I have already stated what I take to be its effect, and, although it is badly drawn, the section is really a statutory rule postponing a wife's claim against her husband's estate in bankruptcy to the claims of his other creditors. This is, therefore, one of the rules, as to debts provable, which by s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, have to be observed in administering the estates of deceased insolvents.

E This conclusion is not inconsistent with Re May, Crawford v. May (7), which was not a case of proof but of retainer by the wife as her husband's administratrix. The legislature has not yet thought proper to alter the law of retainer, and s. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act is not addressed to that subject. It only remains to notice the point that the husband's estate is not proved to be insolvent. When he died his assets exceeded his debts, but unfortunately the costs of the administration action have to be provided for, and it is admitted that his estate is insolvent if the costs of the administration action are to be taken into account. But these costs must be paid out of the estate of the deceased before any question can arise which concerns the payment of his creditors. With reference to their payment and to their priorities inter se it would be contrary to common sense to call an estate solvent when the amount divisible among them is not sufficient to pay them all in full. Reliance was placed on the phraseology of s. 10 when dealing with companies, and on the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius. This maxim, however, is seldom satisfactory unless some good reason can be given for supposing that the speaker really intended to exclude what he did not expressly mention. In this particular case such an intention would be unreasonable and cannot be imputed to the legislature. The express mention of costs in dealing with companies being wound-up and the omission of all mention of costs in dealing with the estates of deceased persons are easily accounted for. The section applies to all modes of winding-up companies, but only to one mode of administering the estates of deceased persons—viz., administration by the court. It may well have been considered desirable to point out to liquidators winding-up insolvent companies without the assistance of the court that they must deduct the costs of winding-up, and then see whether the assets left are sufficient to pay the debts in full or are insufficient for that purpose. It was quite unnecessary to instruct the judges of the High Court on such a subject. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision of the Chancellor of the Duchy was correct, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The first and main question is whether, when a deceased husband's estate is being administered in the Chancery Division, and there is not sufficient to pay the creditors in full, the rule which applies in bankruptcy as to the wife's proof against her husband's estate for money lent by her to him for the purposes of his trade is to be imported when the widow claims in the administration against the estate of her deceased husband. A

The statutes which relate to this point are as follows. By s. 25 (1) of the Judicature Act, 1873, it was enacted that, B

"in the administration by the court of the assets of any person who may die after the commencement of this Act, and whose estate may prove to be insufficient for the payment in full of his debts and liabilities, the same rules shall prevail and be observed, as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors, and as to debts and liabilities provable, and as to the valuation of annuities, and future or contingent liabilities respectively, as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt." C

By s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, that sub-section is repealed, and is re-enacted with the addition that the enactment is made applicable to the winding-up of companies in addition to the administration of estates of deceased persons by the court, which are insufficient to pay the debts in full. In 1882 the Married Women's Property Act of that year became law. By s. 3 it is enacted : D

"Any money . . . of a wife lent . . . by her to her husband for the purpose of any trade or business carried on by him, shall be treated as assets of her husband's estate in the case of his bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the amount . . . of such money . . . after, but not before, all claims of the other creditors of the husband . . . have been satisfied." E

If the husband becomes bankrupt it is clear that the rule which is enacted by statute is that for money lent by the wife to her husband for the purposes of his trade, she is not to prove till her husband's other creditors have been satisfied; and this was rightly so held by CAVE, J., in Re Genese (1). We have, therefore, one statute (Married Women's Property Act, 1882) laying down in clear terms what the rule of bankruptcy is to be as regards the proof of a wife in the case of bankruptcy of her husband, and another statute (Judicature Act, 1875) enacting that in administering insolvent estates of deceased persons the same rules shall be observed as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy. So far matters are apparently clear; but it is said that, although there are these two statutes standing together, it has been decided that the rule laid down in s. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is not, by s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, imported into administrations of deceased husbands' estates which are insolvent. In the first place, I know of no case which deals with the conjoint operation of s. 10 of the Act of 1875 and s. 3 of the Act of 1882, with the exception of Re May (7), which was not a case—as the learned judge himself pointed out—of the widow seeking to prove, but of the right of retainer by the widow, to which s. 3 of the Act of 1882 did not apply. It is true that it has been held by authority which cannot be controverted that all the rules of bankruptcy are not incorporated into the administration of insolvent estates by s. 10 of the Act of 1875, and the question now is whether the rule in s. 3 of the Act of 1882 is so or not. F
H

It is difficult to extract from the cases the principle upon which each has been decided with this exception, that I think it may be stated that the courts have held that s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, does not import into administrations those provisions of the bankruptcy law which merely go to swell the assets of the estate which is being administered; such, for instance, as the provisions by which a judgment creditor is not allowed to reap the benefit of his execution by reason of a bankruptcy intervening before its completion (Re Withernsea Brickworks (2)), followed by CHITTY, J., in Pratt v. Inman (4), or the provision that money received I

A by way of a fraudulent preference must be returned. But has any binding authority gone further, and held that the rules as to proof of debts in bankruptcy are not incorporated? If there be such an authority, what becomes of the express words in s. 10 of the Act of 1875, "the same rules shall prevail . . . . as to debts and liabilities provable"? COTTON, L.J., in Re Withernsea Brickworks (2), stated what I take to be the principle, if there be one to be extracted from the cases, B when he said (16 Ch.D. at p. 341) :

C "What is proposed to be done in the present case is not to apply a particular rule to the administration of the assets of the company, but to bring into the assets something which, apart from this section [s. 10], would not be assets because it has been seized by a creditor under such circumstances that he can hold it as a security for his debt."

D As regards swelling the assets to be distributed, it appears to me that the cases have decided that the law of bankruptcy does not apply; but as regards the distributing of the assets, i.e., as regards the proofs to be allowed, I find no case binding me to hold that the rules of bankruptcy do not apply. It is true that in 1882 FRY, J., in Re Maggi (3), held that the bankruptcy rule that all debts shall be paid pari passu (s. 32 of Bankruptcy Act, 1869) was not imported into the administration of insolvent estates, and that consequently a judgment creditor took priority over other creditors; and he placed what he termed the narrower construction upon s. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, and held it was confined to cases E in which the rights of a class of secured creditors were conflicting with a class of unsecured creditors, and had no application to the rights inter se of the members of those classes. This is not a decision upon the conjoint operation of the statutes which we have now to consider, and I, therefore, do not inquire if the construction of s. 10 is not too narrow, and moreover that case does not bind me.

F What is the true reading of s. 3 of the Act of 1882? It is said that the first part of the section goes to swell the assets of the estate which is being administered, and this is true, for without the first link of the section the wife's money would have been a provable debt, and it not being so until after the other creditors are satisfied the assets are pro tanto enhanced. But this is not all the section enacts, for it expressly and in unmistakable terms enacts that her proof shall be postponed until the other creditors of the husband are satisfied. It appears to me that s. 3 of the Married Women's Property Act is explicit as to the proof of the wife. G I cannot get over the enactment, and I do not see that the cases cited bind me to hold otherwise. I, therefore, am of opinion that the Chancellor arrived at a right conclusion. As to whether the costs of administration were to be added before ascertaining whether the deceased husband's estate could pay its liabilities in full, I am of opinion that they must be, though in this case they certainly appear to me to be very large.

LABOUCHERE v. HESS AND ANOTHER

The court will restrain a person who is in possession of letters from publishing them against the will of the writer, except under special circumstances, e.g., where the publication is necessary for the purpose of clearing the defendant's character. The first defendant not having shown that his purpose in publishing certain letters, as he threatened to do, was to clear his character, an injunction was granted against him. An injunction was refused against the second defendant, the widow of the recipient of the letters which had been written to him by the plaintiff, on her stating that she was about to publish a book about her husband's life in which she proposed to publish some of the letters.

Action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from publishing letters written by the plaintiff to the husband of one of the defendants.

The plaintiff, Henry Labouchere, M.P., was the proprietor and editor of the weekly paper "Truth." The first defendant, Hess, was the editor and publisher of a weekly paper called the "African Critic." On Oct. 2, 1897, the defendant published a supplement to his paper headed :

"The stock-jobbing of Henry Labouchere, M.P. for Northampton, proprietor of 'Truth' and late member of the British South Africa Committee," I which consisted of an attack on Mr. Labouchere in respect of his transactions on the Stock Exchange many years before. The supplement contained the following passage :

"I have, however, in my possession complete proofs that Mr. Labouchere also carried on his stock-jobbing transactions in later years, and, if necessary, I shall be quite willing to publish them; but before doing so, I desire to challenge Mr. Labouchere to refute, if he can, the charges already proved against him by me. This is Oct. 2, 1897. I will give him until the last day of this year—i.e., three months—to have his innings, as his friends call it, and take such steps to vindicate his character as the aspersions I have cast upon it call for. If by Dec. 31, 1897, he shall not have taken any such measures, I intend, beginning with my issue of Jan. 1, 1898, to commence a series of revelations about his latter-day conduct which I promise will pale the disclosures already made into utter insignificance.”

In “Truth” of Oct. 7 Mr. Labouchere published his answer to the charges in an article which contained the following passage :

“You have my leave to comment on my articles in the ‘World’ as you please. You may publish and republish my letters to Mr. Beer as often as you please. I should not have to bring an action in order to hinder this. A letter belongs to the writer, and I might obtain an injunction tomorrow to prevent your publication of any of mine. I have, however, you will be glad to hear, not the remotest intention to take this course. You may continue to scatter broadcast gratis copies of your journal in which you prove that I was a quarter of a century ago worthy of penal servitude, or, if you prefer it, that I ought to have been hanged a quarter of a century before that. You will not draw me.”

On Oct. 6 the defendant in his paper referred to an action brought by Mr. Holloway against a newspaper for libel, in which Mr. Holloway had objected to having any Jews on the jury, and quoted from the current issue of “Truth” a passage which he said showed that Mr. Labouchere rather fancied Jews as jurors and added :

“One of the first Labouchere letters which I shall publish in facsimile next year will show the reason why Mr. Labouchere considers Jews to make good jurymen.”

On Nov. 15, 1897, the plaintiff brought this action against Hess and the second defendant, Mrs. Sala, the widow of G. A. Sala, to restrain them from publishing any letters written by the plaintiff to Mr. G. A. Sala, to which he believed that the defendant’s threats referred, and from informing any person or persons of their or any of their contents. The plaintiff stated in an affidavit that he had been an intimate friend of Mr. Sala, who died in 1895; that he had written to him many letters extending over a period of twenty years; that these letters were wholly of a private nature; and that the plaintiff was informed and believed that Mrs. Sala, acting in collusion with Hess, had recently made over to him a considerable number of letters written by the plaintiff to G. A. Sala, for the purposes of publication, and intended to supply him with others for the purpose of publication. The fact that some letters from the plaintiff to G. A. Sala were in the possession of Hess was admitted. Mrs. Sala stated that upon her marriage in 1890 G. A. Sala handed over to her, as a wedding present, all his manuscripts, letters, and documents, and literary notes, and that she had in his lifetime, when he was in financial difficulties, at his request, disposed of and charged a considerable number of his MSS. letters and autographs for his benefit. She denied that she was acting in collusion with Hess for the purpose of publishing the plaintiff’s letters, which she still had in her possession, or had any intention of publishing them, except that she was about to publish a life of her husband, in which she proposed including certain letters to him from the plaintiff and persons of eminence. Hess admitted that he had acquired from Mrs. Sala certain letters from the plaintiff to G. A. Sala, and that one of them was the letter referred to in the “African Critic” of Nov. 6. He denied that he had undertaken to publish, or told anyone that he intended to publish, the letters, but he claimed that he was entitled to do so.

NORTH, J., after reading the passages from the "African Critic" hereinbefore set out, and stating the facts :—The first point argued before me was the general one that, as a matter of law, the court cannot restrain the publication of letters written by the plaintiff Labouchere to Mr. Sala. There may be particular exceptions which would justify the use of these letters, but the defendants' case is based on general grounds—that the defendant has the right independently of any particular reasons to publish these letters.

I think the authorities are very clear and specific against his having any such right. First of all, in Pope v. Curl (1), a case relating to the sale of a book containing letters from SWIFT to POPE, and others, LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., says (2 Atk. 342) :

"Another objection has been made by the defendant's counsel, that where a man writes a letter, it is in the nature of a gift to the receiver. But I am of opinion that it is only a special property in the receiver; possibly the property of the paper may belong to him; but this does not give a licence to any person whatsoever to publish them to the world, for at most the receiver has only a joint property with the writer. . . . It has been insisted on by the defendant's counsel, that this is a sort of work which does not come within the meaning of the Act of Parliament [Copyright Act, 1709], because it contains only letters on familiar subjects, and inquiries after the health of friends, and cannot properly be called a learned work. It is certain that no works have done more service to mankind than those which have appeared in this shape, upon familiar subjects, and which perhaps were never intended to be published; and it is this that makes them so valuable; for I must confess for my own part that letters which are very elaborately written, and originally intended for the press, are generally the most insignificant, and very little worth any person's reading."

In Thompson v. Stanhope (2), a case relating to the publication of the letters of the then late Lord Chesterfield, LORD APSLEY says :

"[It] was very clear that an injunction ought to be granted. That the widow had no right to print the letters without the consent of Lord Chesterfield or his executors; that she had obtained neither the one nor the other; that Lord Chesterfield, when he declined taking the letters, and said she might keep them, did not mean to give her leave to print and publish them; that she did very ill in keeping copies of the characters, when Lord Chesterfield meant that they should be destroyed and forgot; that the executors cannot be said to have given their consent, though his Lordship thought they would have done better if they had applied earlier, before the expense of printing was incurred. He said it was within the reason of several cases where injunctions had been granted, and cited the case of Mr. Forrester, of Mr. Webb, of Mr. Pope's LETTERS, printed by Curl, and LORD CLARENDON'S LIFE, advertised to be published by Dr. Shebbeare."

The next case to which I have to refer on this subject is Lord and Lady Perceval v. Phipps (3). That was a case in which, upon the facts stated in the bill, LORD ELDON, L.C., had granted an injunction. The injunction was in common form then, an injunction before answer. Then the answer was put in, and the application reported is an application to PLUMER, V.-C., to discharge the injunction upon the reading of the answer. The substance of the answer was that Lady Perceval had written a letter which had been published, and after the publication she denied that it was by her authority, and the intention in using the other letters, which were letters from her, was to show that it was by her authority that the letter in question had been written. On the case made by the answer no one could doubt that it was a case in which the injunction could not be maintained, and no doubt it would not have been granted if matters had been stated in the bill which

A appeared on the face of the answer. It is one of the cases which shows the inception of the rule that a letter cannot be published by the receiver; but I do not think I should be doing justice to that case if I did not say this. I draw the inference from the language of the Vice-Chancellor that if the matter had come before him as a new case he would have doubted whether the court could have granted the injunction which had been granted by the Lord Chancellor. It had been granted, and, as he said in his judgment, he admits that the injunction originally was proper for this purpose, but he dissolved it upon the merits disclosed by the answer of the defendant.

B Then, again, there is Gee v. Pritchard (4). That was a case before LORD ELDON, L.C. It is the leading case on this subject, and I think it is strengthened by the fact that, I gather, if the matter had come before LORD ELDON as an entirely new matter, he might have had some doubt whether he would have granted the injunction in such a case or not, but, finding what the law was, recognising the law, he says that injunctions of such a nature can be granted. He says (2 Swan. at pp. 414, 424) :

D "The difficulty which I have felt in all these cases is this : If I had written a letter on the subject of an individual for whom both the person to whom I wrote and myself had a common regard, and the question arose for the first time, I should have found it difficult to satisfy my mind that there is a property in the letter; but it is my duty to submit my judgment to the authority of those who have gone before me, and it will not be easy to remove the weight of the decisions of LORD HARDWICKE and LORD APSLEY. The doctrines of this court ought to be as well settled, and made as uniform almost as those of the common law, laying down fixed principles, but taking care that they are to be applied according to the circumstances of each case, I cannot agree that the doctrines of this court are to be changed with every succeeding judge. . . . I am of opinion that the plaintiff has a sufficient property in the original letters to authorise an injunction, unless she has by some act deprived herself of it. Laying out of the case much of what Mr. Wetherell has urged with so much ingenuity, I say only that, though a letter is a subject of property, capable of being much more largely dealt with in communication than books, as, by reading to others, repeating passages, etc., yet the court has never been alarmed out of the practice of granting injunctions relative to letters, to the extent to which it grants them in the case of books, because persons may assemble others, and read and recite to them, it is not deterred from giving that relief because it cannot give other relief more effectual. . . . In stating what LORD HARDWICKE says on the subject, though I cannot at the moment refer to cases, I state that which, in cases, has been handed down as the law of the court."

H I think, therefore, that he was not only referring to LORD HARDWICKE's judgment in Pope v. Curl (1), but to the tradition of the profession as to such cases having existed, and injunctions having been granted in them. He was not referring to decided cases, because he especially says that he cannot at the moment refer to cases; then he goes on to refer to Pope v. Curl (1) and Thompson v. Stanhope (2). Then he says (ibid. at p. 426) :

I "The doctrine is thus laid down, following the principle of LORD HARDWICKE. I do not say that I am to interfere because the letters are written in confidence, or because the publication of them may wound the feelings of the plaintiff, but if mischievous effects of that kind can be apprehended in cases in which this court has been accustomed, on the ground of property to forbid publication, it would not become me to abandon the jurisdiction which my predecessors have exercised, and refuse to forbid it. Such is my opinion, and it is not shaken by the case of Lord and Lady Perceval v. Phipps (3). I will not say that there may not be a case of exception, but if there is, the exception must be established on examination of the letters; and I think that it will be extremely difficult to say where that distinction is to be found between private letters of one nature and private letters of another nature. For the purposes of public justice publicly administered according to the established institutions of the country, the letters must always be produced; I do not say that of justice administered by private hands; nor do I say that there may not be a case such as the Vice-Chancellor thought the case before him where the acts of the parties supply reasons for not interfering; but that differs most materially from this case."

He continued the injunction, the terms of which are found on page 406 :

"To restrain the defendants from printing or publishing the said original letters, or copies or copy of the original letters written by the plaintiff, or extracts or extract."

In addition to those cases, there are many others where a similar jurisdiction has been exercised. For example, there is the Irish case Earl of Granard v. Dunkin (5); there is the dictum of LORD CAMPBELL in Boosey v. Jefferys (6); and there is Earl of Lytton v. Devey (7), before BACON, V.-C., one of the latest cases on the subject, which I entirely accept subject to the qualification that I am not quite sure that the question in whom the property in the paper lies is quite as clear upon the authorities as the Vice-Chancellor seems to think it, but that is not relevant at all to the present case. There are several other cases referred to, in which forms of decree are given in SETON ON DECREES. There is also Hopkinson v. Burghley (8), the question there being whether documents could be produced for the purposes of justice in a case. TURNER, L.J., says (2 Ch. App. at p. 448) :

"The writer of a letter trusts the receiver with his letter, and he must take the consequences of its being in his possession. The question which now arises is between a stranger and the receiver. If the sender of a letter wishes to restrain the receiver from showing it to any other person he must file a bill for that purpose. Unless that is done, the property is in the receiver. There must, however, be an undertaking not to use the documents, or any copies of them, for any collateral object."

Then LORD CAIRNS, one of the soundest lawyers and most able judges who ever sat on the bench, says this (ibid. at pp. 448, 449) :

"The question in all these cases is, what was the purpose or object in the mind of the person sending the letter? The writer is supposed to intend that the receiver may use it for any lawful purpose, and it has been held that publication is not such a lawful purpose. But if there is a lawful purpose for which a letter can be used it is the production of it in a court of justice for the furtherance of the ends of justice."

Then it was required in that case to be produced, subject to the undertaking to which I have already referred.

The cases seem to me to make the law as clear as possible, and there can be no doubt that, unless there is some reason why the rule should not be applied in this case, the court has jurisdiction, and ought to restrain the defendant from publishing letters written by the plaintiff to Mr. Sala.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the evidence and said that there appeared no reason why the publication of the letters should not be restrained in the present case. In particular, he said:] Then the defendant's counsel relies strongly on the line of argument which was successful in Lord and Lady Perceval v. Phipps (3), and he suggested that the defendant has the right to publish these letters to clear his character, to justify something he has done, or to vindicate himself. The defendant does not say that he is publishing those letters for any such reason, and, as far as I can gather from the materials that are before me, there is no ground whatever for suggesting that he intends to publish these letters to vindicate himself or to clear his own character, which he does not suggest has been attacked in any way or requires vindication. His only purpose in publishing these letters is not to white-wash himself but to blacken the plaintiff. It is not to prove that he is an honest man, but for the purpose of proving that the plaintiff is not. It seems to me, therefore, that, as regards the first defendant, I must grant the injunction substantially as asked. The injunction asks to restrain him from using the letters for the purposes of publication; and then comes these words—"and from informing any person or persons of their or any of their contents." I think that, if I were to grant the injunction in those terms, I should be going too far. I do not know under what circumstances they might possibly be used. It may be that on some occasion they could properly be used for a legitimate purpose, but I think that I should be going too far in inserting those words in the present case. As regards Mrs. Sala, her case stands somewhat differently. Whatever may be the fact as to the time when, and the circumstances under which, she parted with the possession of the letters, she says that they were parted with during her husband's lifetime to assist in supporting them when they were in pecuniary difficulties. She adds:

"I am not acting in collusion with the defendant, Henry Hess, for the purpose of publishing the plaintiff's letters, but I am about to publish a book entitled 'The Life and Letters of George Augustus Sala,' in which I propose publishing certain of my husband's letters received from Mr. Labouchere and persons of eminence, with copies of letters written by Mr. Sala to others, and letters to myself. I am, and have been, acquainted with the plaintiff, Henry Labouchere, but I have no ill-feeling against him, nor have I ever threatened to publish any letters of a libellous nature concerning him. I have in my possession, under the circumstances before mentioned, certain letters written by the said Henry Labouchere to my late husband, George Augustus Sala; but I have no intention of publishing the same or parting with the said letters, or divulging the contents of same, other than as before mentioned."

Therefore, there is that express denial of her intention to publish except under the circumstances that she voluntarily states—that she contemplates writing a book containing an account of her husband's life, and possibly containing letters from Mr. Labouchere and persons of eminence. I think that she ought to be advised as to how far she might publish those letters or not when the time comes, but that matter is not the subject of this action. It is a mere voluntary statement of hers of something that she intends. She denies altogether any collusion with Mr. Hess, and, as regards the letters in her own possession, she says that she has no intention of publishing them or parting with possession of them, or of divulging the contents of them. That is her statement, and I must take it to be correct, and I think, therefore, that as against her the action fails.

Sale of Goods—Goods expected to be acquired—Offer by dealer by advertisement to sell manufacturer's goods at wholesale price—Goods not in dealer's possession at time of advertisement—Damage to manufacturer's trade—Injunction—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict., c. 71), s. 5.

As a general rule any person may sell or offer for sale at any price whatsoever goods of which he is not the owner, but which he hopes or expects to acquire, and he may offer such goods for sale by advertisement or in any other lawful way and his motive in so acting cannot be inquired into.

By the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 5 (1): "The goods which form the subject of a contract for sale may be either existing goods . . . or goods to be manufactured or acquired by the seller after the making of the contract of sale. . . ."

The defendant, a retail dealer, by advertisements in newspapers, offered for sale at trade price a new piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture. In doing so he thereby damaged the plaintiffs' trade by causing their customers to cease to give them further orders on the ground that they could not compete with the defendant if he sold pianos at that price. At the time of the first advertisements the defendant did in fact have such a new piano in stock, but the advertisements continued after it was sold. The plaintiffs refused to supply the defendant with further pianos, but the defendant expected to acquire some from other dealers. In an action by the plaintiffs for an injunction to restrain the defendant from issuing further advertisements,

Held: (i) having regard to s. 5 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the defendant was entitled to offer for sale by means of the advertisements goods which he expected to acquire in the future; (ii) the misrepresentation in the advertisements that the defendant had in his possession a new piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture at the dates of the issue of the advertisements was not the direct cause of the damage to the plaintiffs' trade as the same consequences would have followed had the representation been true; consequently, the plaintiffs had no right of action and were not entitled to sue.

Action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from advertising for sale goods of the plaintiffs' manufacture at trade price unless such goods were actually in the defendant's possession at the time of the issue of the advertisement.

D The plaintiffs were manufacturers of pianos carrying on business in London, who made and supplied their customers with various classes of pianos, including class 1, the Britannia model, supplied to the trade at 15 guineas; class 2, supplied to the trade at 17 guineas; and class 6a, described in the price list as an "upright grand, iron frame, check action trichord," supplied to the trade at £23 10s., in all cases with 5 per cent. discount for cash and four months' credit allowed.

E The defendant was a furnishing contractor, who carried on business in an extensive way at Manchester. In the early part of 1895 the plaintiffs supplied the defendant with several pianos—two of class 2, at the trade price, on Jan. 26 and Feb. 15; one of class 6a on April 25; and two of the Britannia model on April 23 and May 5. The last two (the Britannia models) formed part of an order for twelve pianos of that class which had been given by the defendant to the plaintiffs, but which, in consequence of some dissatisfaction of the plaintiffs with the advertisements issued by the defendant, the plaintiffs refused to execute. Their definite refusal so to do became known to the defendant at an interview between him and the senior partner of the plaintiffs' firm in August, 1895. On Feb. 22, 1896, the defendant published in the "Manchester Evening News" (a newspaper having a large circulation in Manchester and the neighbourhood) an advertisement in the following form :

G "Great Sale of Pianos at Worsley's.
Hundreds of Bargains on View.
Pianos by all the Great Makers.
Worsley's, the Pantheon Gaythorne.
. . . . .
H Special List.
. . . . .
New Instruments at Worsley's.
A fine upright Grand by Ajello, iron frame, check action, trichord. Price 15 guineas, or 15s. per month."

I A similar advertisement appeared in the same paper from Feb. 24 to 29, both dates inclusive, and on Mar. 2 to 7; and a similar advertisement appeared in the "Northern Daily Telegraph" on Mar. 5, 25 and 28, and on April 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 16 and 17. The object of the action was to restrain the continuance of these advertisements. By the statement of claim the plaintiff sought (i) an injunction to restrain the defendant from maliciously or for the purpose of injuring the plaintiffs in their trade, advertising or otherwise offering for sale (a) either a new pianoforte of the plaintiffs' manufacture at the price of 15 guineas (such being less than the plaintiffs' wholesale price for a similar pianoforte) or any other sum less than the wholesale price, or

(b) that which is not in fact a new pianoforte of the plaintiffs' manufacture as a new pianoforte of the plaintiffs' manufacture; (ii) an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants and agents, from passing off or attempting to pass off pianofortes not of the plaintiffs' manufacture as or for the goods of the plaintiffs by advertisement or in any other way; (iii) damages for injuring the plaintiffs in their trade; (iv) damages for passing off; and (v) costs. So far as it sought to restrain the defendant from passing off or attempting to pass off goods of other manufacturers as those of the plaintiffs' the case was abandoned at the trial, it being admitted that there was no evidence to support any such charge against the defendant. At the Bar what was sought was an injunction not in the form asked by the statement of claim, but in a modified form.

The defendant in cross-examination admitted that he had one new instrument in stock, and it was admitted that at the dates of several of the advertisements complained of the defendant had no pianos of the plaintiffs' manufacture in stock. Therefore the advertisements were not in accordance with the fact. It was established by the evidence that the plaintiffs suffered damage by reason of the defendant's advertisement. This was proved by certain of their customers who were retail dealers in pianos and who declined to give the plaintiffs further orders on the ground that, buying as they did at the list price of fifteen guineas, they could not sell new pianos of the plaintiffs at the price advertised by the defendant, and that so long as these advertisements continued the public, believing that they could be supplied at the price advertised for the plaintiffs' pianos, would refuse to deal at a higher price. Henry Sharples, one of the plaintiffs' customers and witnesses and a pianoforte and musical instrument dealer at Blackburn, said that at the time when these advertisements began to be issued one of the plaintiffs' Britannia model pianos was in stock for which he had paid fifteen guineas. He had an application for it from a customer and asked £24. The customer refused to give it and called attention to the defendant's advertisements. He further stated that, though there was no difficulty in selling the plaintiffs' pianos, yet, that after the advertisements he was unable to sell the one he had, and ultimately sent it away to a town in Yorkshire where it was sold.

The defendant described his business as that of a general furnishing contractor, carpet factor, and piano manufacturer and dealer. He stated that the practice in his business was to advertise for sale articles in which he dealt, and in order to attract the public, to select goods which had been for some time in stock and offer them at a low price yielding little or no profit, while other goods were offered at prices which yielded considerable profit; and that on the whole he was enabled to carry on his business and make a profit. He further stated that, at the commencement of 1896, he fixed on pianos as the subject of advertisement, and began to advertise them as early as February, 1896; that at that date he had in stock an instrument of the plaintiffs', of the Britannia model class, and that he selected it (among others) as to be offered at a low price, and that the advertisement was intended originally to refer to this particular piano. This particular piano must, having regard to the admissions in the action, have been sold before Feb. 22, but the advertisement still continued. One explanation given by the defendant of this was, that for a time he was prepared to take orders from customers for the plaintiffs' pianos. Though, if he could not get them direct from the plaintiffs he had, he said, lots of dealers who could supply him, though no doubt the plaintiffs would refuse to sell to such dealers if they knew who they were. He said also, that it was difficult, or at all events would cause additional expense, to alter the advertisements in the newspapers after directions had been given for their insertion.

With reference to the question whether the defendant's advertisement was a fair description of a piano of the Britannia model class, Ajello the senior member of the plaintiffs' firm, in cross-examination admitted that a piano of that class was trichord, had an iron frame, and a check action of a kind, but could not be called properly an "upright grand." Thus the term appeared, even according to the

A plaintiffs' witnesses, to have an elastic character, and not to have any definite meaning in the trade. It was applied by different dealers differently.

B [His LORDSHIP considered that the judgment in the case ought to stand over until the decision of the House of Lords in Allen v. Flood (1) (ante p. 52) had been given.]

Jan. 18, 1898. STIRLING, J., having stated the facts and reviewed the evidence, came to the conclusion that the advertisement was a highly coloured, but not inaccurate, description of the piano in question and that there were no grounds to disbelieve the defendant's account of the circumstances of the insertion of the advertisement. He continued.—What the plaintiffs claimed at the Bar by their counsel was an injunction to restrain the defendant from advertising for sale any of the plaintiffs' pianos unless he had in his possession a piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture and of the class advertised. By limiting the claim to an injunction so limited D they virtually admit—and I think rightly—that if the defendant had in his possession a piano of the plaintiffs' manufacture and of the class advertised at the time, he might offer it for sale at any price he chose. Indeed, it appears plain that the owner of any property is entitled to sell or dispose of it for such consideration as he may see fit and either at a profit or at a loss.

E I take it that it is settled by Allen v. Flood (1) that the motive of the owner in so acting cannot be inquired into. I further think that as a general rule any person may sell or offer for sale at any price whatsoever goods of which he is not the owner, but which he hopes or expects to acquire. It is expressly provided by s. 5 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 :

F “(1.) The goods which form the subject of a contract for sale may be either existing goods, owned or possessed by the seller, or goods to be manufactured or acquired by the seller after the making of the contract of sale, in this Act entitled ‘future goods.’ (2.) There may be a contract for the sale of goods, the acquisition of which by the seller depends upon a contingency which may or may not happen. (3.) Where by a contract of sale the seller purports to effect a present sale of future goods, the contract operates as an agreement to sell the G goods.”

And these last-mentioned goods in the Act are designated by the convenient term “future goods.” If a seller contracts to sell future goods he must be at liberty as a first step of such contract to offer them for sale. And I see nothing to prevent his making such an offer by advertisement or in any other lawful way. Again, it seems to me that he is entitled to make the offer at any price he pleases, remunerative or H not. It may be worth a tradesman's while to sell some goods at a loss, so long as he is able to sell others at a countervailing or more than countervailing profit.

In all this I assume that the seller is acting honestly. If what he does is tainted with fraud he may be guilty of an actionable wrong. An illustration is afforded by Richardson v. Silvester (2). There (L.R. 9 Q.B. at p. 34) :

thereof, whereas afterwards it appeared that the defendant had no power to let the property as advertised and caused the advertisement to be issued to serve some purpose of his own other than that appearing by the advertisement. And that the defendant knew at the time he caused that advertisement to be published that he had not the power to let the farm and that the farm was not to be let.' The county court judge ruled that the particulars disclosed no cause of action and non-suited the plaintiff. Held: that the particulars contained allegations amounting to a fraudulent representation for which an action would lie."

In the present case the plaintiffs had, in the autumn of 1895, refused to supply the defendant with any of their pianos, and they continued such refusal down to the commencement of the action. The defendant, therefore, could not get from the plaintiffs any of their new pianos, but in my opinion he might by indirect means have acquired new pianos of theirs upon terms which would not indeed enable him to sell at a profit, but which need not have involved a ruinous loss. If, then, the defendant had seen fit to advertise that he was prepared to supply new pianos of the plaintiffs' manufacture of the Britannia model type, then I think he would have been within his legal rights.

It is said, however, that the advertisement actually published contained two misrepresentations, first, that the piano to which it related (being according to the defendant's statement of the Britannia model type) was described as "upright grand, with check action and trichord," and second, that such piano was in the possession of the defendant at the several dates when the advertisement appeared. As regards the first point, as I have already stated, in my opinion the description cannot be treated as inaccurate, and in argument the main stress was laid on the second point. In my judgment this misrepresentation does not make the advertisement fraudulent, and in order that a misrepresentation may be actionable it must not only be untrue, but must cause damage. Therefore beyond the damage to the plaintiffs it must be attributable as a cause of damage to the person who complains of it. The question then arises, is the damage complained of by the plaintiffs attributable to the misrepresentation of fact contained in the advertisement. It appears that this question must be answered in the negative, for an advertisement such as, in my opinion, the defendant might legally have issued, would have produced precisely the same consequences, and have been followed by the same damaging results.

No decision in support of such an action as the present was cited in argument. What was mainly relied on by the plaintiffs' counsel was the general statement of the law laid down by BOWEN, L.J., in the Court of Appeal in Mogul Steamship Co. v. MacGregor, Gow & Co. (3). He states the law thus (23 Q.B.D. at p. 614):

"What then, are the limitations which the law imposes on a trader in the conduct of his business as between himself and other traders? There seem to be no burdens or restrictions in law upon a trader which arise merely from the fact that he is a trader, and which are not equally laid on all other subjects of the Crown. His right to trade freely is a right which the law recognises and encourages, but it is one which places him at no special disadvantage as compared with others. No man, whether trader or not, can, however, justify damaging another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden; so is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it."

Then he proceeds to give a number of illustrations, and what, I think, are general propositions. I do not think it necessary to inquire whether the law laid down by the House of Lords in Allen v. Flood (1) imposes any limitations or qualifications on the views there expressed; for, in my opinion, the present case does not fall within the class in which damage caused by misrepresentation arises within the

A meaning of the lord justice. The class of cases which he had in mind was that of which Ratcliffe v. Evans (4) is an example. It was there held that, where a defendant had intentionally published an untrue statement regarding the plaintiff's business, and thereby had in the ordinary course caused damage to the plaintiff, he was liable. Here the untrue statement related to the defendant's own business, and I may point out that, if it affected the plaintiffs' business at all, it did not affect it exclusively, for Mr. Sharples and every music-dealer in the neighbourhood of Manchester who happened at the time to have the plaintiffs' pianos in his shop, suffered damage as well as the plaintiffs. However, for the reasons I have already stated, I think the damage to the plaintiffs was not caused by the misrepresentation contained in the advertisement; consequently, the action fails and must be dismissed.

C I cannot, however, approve of the defendant's conduct. The advertisement was not such as ought to have been published, and great negligence was shown as regards the withdrawal of it. I think, therefore, that the defendant is not entitled to any costs of the action, except in so far as these costs have been increased by the unfounded charge (namely, that of passing off as of the plaintiffs' manufacture a piano that was not so) which forms the subject of para. (ii) of the prayer in the statement of the claim. These costs will be paid by the plaintiffs.

CONSOLIDATED EXPLORATION AND FINANCE CO. v. MUSGRAVE

Criminal Law—Bail—Indemnity against possible loss given to bailor by third person—Legality.

G A contract by a third party to indemnify a person who has agreed to go bail against a loss to him occasioned by the non-appearance of the accused to stand trial in a criminal matter is contrary to public policy and illegal.

H In consideration of the defendant agreeing to go bail for A. and J., who were being prosecuted on a charge of fraud, A. procured a transfer of shares, the property of the plaintiff company, to be made to the defendant in the usual form for a nominal consideration as an indemnity to the defendant for any loss he might incur through agreeing to go bail. The defendant wrote to A. setting out the terms of the agreement. In the result the defendant went bail on the terms of the agreement for J. only, who absconded. The defendant's recognisances were estreated and he was obliged to pay a considerable sum of money. He therefore retained the shares. The plaintiff company went into liquidation, and the investigation of its affairs resulted in an action against the defendant to compel him to re-transfer the shares.

I Held: the indemnity being against public policy and illegal, the transfer of the shares to the defendant was also illegal and void and the defendant must re-transfer the shares to the plaintiff company.

Action by the plaintiff company for a declaration that the defendant should be declared a trustee for them of 1,500 preference shares transferred to him as indemnity against loss occasioned by estreated bail, and that the defendant should be compelled to re-transfer the shares to them.

In October, 1897, William H. Ainsworth and Francis R. Jordan with others were prosecuted for fraud in connection with the promotion of a company known as Thomas Edward Brinsmead & Sons, Ltd.; and the defendant Christopher G. Musgrave, at the request of W. H. Ainsworth, agreed to become bail for him and F. R. Jordan on receiving as security 1,500 preference shares in the London Woollen Co., Ltd., who were also made defendants to the action. The terms of the agreement were set out in a letter dated Dec. 23, 1897, written by the defendant Musgrave to W. H. Ainsworth, as follows :

“In consideration of your transferring into my name 1,500 shares in the London Woollen Co., Ltd., I agree to become surety for you and Mr. Francis R. Jordan in the sum of £1,500 each to appear at the High Court of Justice on the trial of R. v. Brinsmead and others, and also to enter into the required recognisances with regard thereto and as to payment of costs. And I further agree, in the event of my not being called upon under the terms of my recognisances to make any payment, to re-transfer the said shares to you, or, in the event of my being called upon to provide any sum of money, to dispose only of sufficient shares to recoup for me the amount so paid by me, it being clearly understood, on the other hand, that, should I be called upon to pay such an amount as the shares in question are not sufficient to realise, you will pay me any such amount over and above the amount realised by the sale of the shares.”

The minute book of the Consolidated Exploration and Finance Co., Ltd., contained a minute of a resolution passed by the board of directors of the company on Dec. 23, 1897, as follows :

“The matter of guaranteeing costs Re Brinsmead was considered, and, the Consolidated Contract Corpn. having agreed to pay by way of premium £100, and guaranteeing to indemnify this company against loss, it was resolved that 1,500 shares (London Woollen Preference) be lodged with Mr. Christopher George Musgrave on receipt of cheque from the Consolidated Contract Corpn., and a further 1,000 London Woollen Preference shares with Mr. J. Pronk.”

The transfer of the 1,500 shares to the defendant Musgrave was in the following form :

“We, the Consolidated Exploration and Finance Co., Ltd., of 15, Queen Street, Cheapside, in the city of London, in consideration of the sum of five shillings paid by Christopher George Musgrave, of 23, Martin’s Lane, Cannon Street, in the city of London (hereinafter called the said transferee), do hereby bargain, sell, assign, and transfer to the said transferee 1,500 preference shares of £1 each fully paid and numbered from 60,865 to 60,964 and from 66,504 to 67,903 inclusive of and in the undertaking called the London Woollen Co., Ltd., to hold unto the said transferee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to the several conditions on which we held the same immediately before the execution hereof; and I, the said transferee, do hereby agree to accept and take the said shares subject to the conditions aforesaid.—As witness our hands and seals the 23rd day of December in the year of our Lord 1897.”

A The transfer was duly executed on behalf of the company, and the seal of the company was affixed thereto in accordance with the articles of association of the company.

When these events took place, an application for a writ of certiorari to remove the indictment from the Central Criminal Court to the High Court was being made, so that the defendant Musgrave originally became bail for the appearance of W. H. Ainsworth and F. R. Jordan in the High Court. This application, however, fell through, and W. H. Ainsworth found another surety; but, at his request, the defendant Musgrave became bail on the terms of the letter of Dec. 23, 1897, for the appearance of F. R. Jordan to take his trial at the Central Criminal Court. In the result F. R. Jordan absconded, so that the defendant Musgrave was compelled to pay £1,500 and £15 for costs and expenses, and consequently retained the 1,500 shares which had been transferred to him. The Consolidated Exploration and Finance Co., Ltd., afterwards went into liquidation, and the investigation into its affairs resulted in the present action, which was brought against the defendant Musgrave to compel him to re-transfer the 1,500 shares to the company, which he refused to do on the ground that he held them under a contract with W. A. Ainsworth, who had procured their transfer to him as security for the amount he had been compelled to pay as bail for F. R. Jordan.

E NORTH, J., stated the facts of the case, and, after saying that apart from the illegality of an indemnity to bail the security would have been valid, continued: The next question is whether the security given to the defendant Musgrave, through Ainsworth, was an illegal bargain. In my opinion, it was.

It is contended that the facts of this case do not come within the rule laid down in Wilson v. Strugnell (1) and Herman v. Jeuchner (2), and that although those cases decide that an accused person cannot himself legally give security to his bail, the rule does not apply where the security is given by a third person. For that contention there appears no authority. The exact case does not appear to have arisen; there is no such case in the books. I asked the defendant's counsel whether there was a statement in any text-book in favour of the distinction they set up. I was referred to two text-books; but the passages in them do not contain any such statement, but both correctly represent the decisions in the two cases I have mentioned. In POLLOCK ON CONTRACTS (6th Edn.) p. 316, it is stated:

“An agreement by an accused person with his bail to indemnify him against liability on his recognisances is illegal, as depriving the public of the security of the bail.”

H LEAKE, in his valuable work on the same subject (3rd Edn.) p. 626, puts the matter thus:

“Any contract or engagement having a tendency, however slight, to affect the administration of public justice would be illegal and void.”

One of the instances he gives is

I “an indemnity given by a defendant in a criminal case to his bail because in effect it deprives the public of the intended security for the conduct of the defendant.”

This corresponds with what SIR BALIOL BRETT, M.R., says in Herman v. Jeuchner (2). After defining a contract he says (15 Q.B.D. at p. 563):

“When the object of either the promise or the consideration is to promote the committal of an illegal act, the contract itself is illegal and cannot be enforced.

In the present case the defendant required the plaintiff to deposit £49 for the space of two years, and in consideration of the plaintiff so doing the defendant promised the plaintiff to become a surety for him; the plaintiff on his part undertook to deposit the £49. That is the substance of the contract; is it illegal? To my mind it is illegal because it takes away the protection which the law affords for securing the good behaviour of the plaintiff. When a man is ordered to find bail and a surety becomes responsible for him, the surety is bound at his peril to see that his principal obeys the order of the court—at least this is the rule in the criminal law; but if money to the amount for which the surety is bound is deposited with him as an indemnity against any loss which he may sustain by reason of his principal's conduct, the surety has no interest in taking care that the condition of the recognisance is performed. Therefore the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant is tainted with illegality.”

Upon Mr. Musgrave becoming bail he undertook duties and had given to him corresponding powers of enforcing those duties, which powers no third person who became responsible for the bail could have. What these powers are and the reasons for investing bail with them in criminal cases are stated in PETERSDORFF ON BAIL, p. 514:

“It is essential for the security of the bail that the principal should be compelled to appear at the time and place specified in the recognisance. To enable the bail to effectuate this purpose they are invested with the same unrestricted authority over the person of the defendant as we have already seen is conferred upon them in civil cases. Indeed, in criminal proceedings the power possessed by the bail in obliging the accused to fulfil the terms of the recognisance should be even more unlimited, as by not rendering him they not only forfeit to the public the penalties imposed by law, but perhaps create, in crimes of a flagrant nature, an impossibility of the ends of justice being accomplished. Hence they may seize his person at any time (as on a Sunday) or at any place to carry him to a justice to find new sureties, or be committed in their discharge, and in surrendering the principal they may command the co-operation of the sheriff and any of his officers.”

A person who is not himself bail does not possess these powers. Therefore, it is essential that the person giving bail should be interested in looking after and, if necessary, using the powers he has to prevent the accused from escaping. This is necessary for the protection of the public, and anything tending to prevent or hinder his so doing is illegal.

Why is it not illegal for the bail to be indemnified by a third person, it being admittedly illegal for him to be indemnified by the prisoner? The reason for the illegality is the same in each case. It is argued that the public have in the third person who gives the indemnity the same security of one whose interest it is to produce the prisoner. But that is not so, for he has not the powers of the bail. I think, therefore, that the security given by Ainsworth to Musgrave is illegal and void.

It is said that the plaintiff company cannot recover the shares from Musgrave, but I do not see why. If Ainsworth were suing Musgrave there would be a difficulty in his way; but it appears that the shares do not belong to Ainsworth, but to the plaintiff company, who have not participated in the illegality. I must declare that the security is illegal and void, and order the re-transfer of the shares to the plaintiff company.

By a hire-purchase agreement in writing, dated Jan. 7, 1895, the owner let a gas engine to the hirer to be fixed in his saw-mill on land of which he was owner in fee simple, the hirer to pay the owner £18 before delivery and £3 10s. per month thereafter for ten months, at the end of which time the engine was to become the property of the hirer. If the hirer defaulted in the instalments, the owner was to be at liberty to retake and remove the engine, the hirer having no claim for any money paid, and it was provided that the contract should not operate as a contract for the sale of the engine, but only as an arrangement for its hire, unless and until the hirer should have paid all the instalments. The engine was annexed by screws and bolts to a concrete base level with the soil of the saw-mill. The hirer defaulted in the instalments. On July 24, 1895, he mortgaged his land, together with the saw-mill and fixtures, subject to a proviso for redemption, and on Jan. 17, 1896, he was adjudicated bankrupt. In March, 1896, the mortgagee took possession of the premises together with the engine. In an action by the owner against the mortgagee for the return of the engine,

Held: on the true construction of the agreement coupled with the annexation of the engine to the soil, the engine became a fixture, subject as between the owner and the hirer to the owner's right to unfix it and retake possession if the hirer failed to pay the instalments; this right imposed no legal obligation on any grantee of the land from the hirer, nor could it be enforced in equity against any purchaser of the land without notice of the right, namely, the mortgagee; and, therefore, the owner's remedy was by action against the hirer personally and the action failed.

Appeal from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., on a motion to restrain the defendant from disposing of a gas engine to anyone other than the plaintiff. G

By an indenture, dated Mar. 26, 1894, John George King, a builder, mortgaged to George Jonathan Mills, as security for a loan of £325, a piece of land situate at Worthing, Sussex, on the south side of Southcourt Road, of which he was seised in fee simple in possession. King afterwards erected a saw-mill and other buildings on the land. By an agreement in writing dated Jan. 7, 1895, and made between the plaintiff, Wilfred Hobson, and King, Hobson agreed to let to King one eleven-horse effective power Stockport gas engine complete, for the purpose of being fixed in the saw-mill on the land. It was agreed that King was to pay Hobson for the engine £18 in cash before delivery and the sum of £3 10s. per month after delivery for the period of ten months, at the expiration of which time the engine was to become the absolute property of King; if during the continuance of the hiring King should fail to pay the hire or any part thereof, Hobson should be at liberty I to re-possess himself of and to remove the engine and King should have no claim against Hobson either for money he had paid for use of the engine or for any damage sustained by reason of the retaking; the contract should not be construed to operate in any way as a contract for the sale of the engine, but only as an arrangement for its hire, unless and until King should have paid the instalments. A hire plate with words thereon stating that the engine was the property of Hobson was affixed to the engine.

The engine was received by King, and erected and fitted by him personally on

A the ground floor of his saw-mill. A concrete foundation was built beneath the engine, flush or level with the floor, with four upright bolts let in, one at each corner of such foundation, and projecting upwards. The engine had beneath it a cast-iron hollow base plate (like a large dish cover) fitted with four holes, one at each corner, the bottom rim only of the hollow base plate resting on the floor level of the concrete foundation when the engine was in position. The engine and base plate were placed on the concrete foundation, so that the bolts projected through the holes in the base plate. Nuts were then screwed down on to the bolts, and the engine thus kept in position and prevented from rocking or shifting, as it would have done if merely placed upon the foundation without the aid of the projecting bolts. If it were desired to remove the engine, it would only be necessary to unscrew the nuts at the tops of the four bolts, disconnect the piping by unscrewing the same, whereupon the engine could be raised and lifted off the bolts, and in that way no injury or damage done to the freehold. The exhaust pipe and exhaust boxes, which formed part of the engine, were fixed into the brickwork of the wall of the engine-house. The pulsometer, which also formed part of the engine, was fixed into the brickwork of another wall of the engine-house. There was evidence that the exhaust pipe, exhaust boxes and pulsometer could not be removed without damaging the brickwork of the walls; and that only a portion, therefore, of the engine could be removed by unscrewing the bed plate. Further, that it would be impossible to use the engine for the purpose of working the machinery in the saw-mill unless the engine was solidly fixed to the floor of the building; that the bottom or bed plate of the engine was so constructed for the purpose of being fixed on a solid foundation; and that the engine, moreover, could not be used without the pulsometer and exhaust pipe and boxes, which were essential parts of it, and were fixed into the brickwork of the building as aforesaid.

By an indenture of transfer of mortgage and further charge, dated July 24, 1895, and made between Mills of the first part, King of the second part, and the defendant, the Rev. Peter Rollins Gorringe, of the third part, after reciting the mortgage of Mar. 26, 1894, for £325, and a further advance of £75 to King by Mills, making together £400 then owing to Mills, and that the defendant Gorringe had agreed to pay Mills the sum of £400, and to lend to King the further sum of £200 on having a transfer of such mortgage, Mills, as mortgagee, and King as beneficial owner thereby conveyed to Gorringe the land, together with the saw-mill, engine-house, warehouses, workshops, stables, offices and other buildings erected or erecting on it, and the fixed machinery and fixtures, and together with such rights of way and other easements as were vested in King, to Gorringe in fee simple, subject to the usual proviso for redemption.

King made certain payments in respect of the hire of the engine under the agreement, but towards the end of 1895 he fell into arrear with them and in December, 1895, a trustee was appointed under a deed of arrangement for the benefit of his creditors. On Jan. 9, 1896, a receiving order was made against King, on Jan. 17, 1896, he was adjudicated bankrupt, and on Feb. 11, 1896, a trustee in bankruptcy was appointed. Application was made on behalf of the plaintiff Hobson to the trustee in bankruptcy notifying his claim to the engine, and his intention to re-possess it under the agreement, but on April 24, 1896, the trustee replied that, owing to the mortgagee of the property of King refusing to meet him in the matter, he was unable to come to terms with Hobson. On June 11, 1896, an inspection of the engine was made on behalf of Hobson, when it was discovered that the hire plate had been removed but that the screws which had attached it to the side of the engine had been left in position, indicating where it had been. King admitted that the hire plate was on the engine when delivered to him, and that he had given instructions for it not to be taken off, and that to the best of his belief it remained affixed to the engine up to the time when the premises were taken possession of by his trustee in bankruptcy. Application was subsequently made to defendant Gorringe (who as mortgagee had taken possession of the property) for the return of the engine, as the property of the plaintiff, Hobson, but he refused to deliver it up. A

Hobson then commenced an action against Gorringe for the return of the engine, and notice of motion was given for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant; his servants and agents, until the trial of the action or further order, from selling, disposing of, or creating any charge on, or delivering possession of the engine to any person except the plaintiff. In order to leave the defendant at liberty to proceed with the realisation of his security, the sum of £55, the agreed value of the engine, was deposited by him in a bank, in the joint names of the solicitors of the plaintiff and the defendant respectively, to abide the result of the trial. The motion, treated by consent as the trial of the action, came on before KEKEWICH, J., who decided that the gas engine, being affixed to the ground, was intended to be used as a part of the building; that it was immaterial whether it was so affixed before or after the mortgage; and that it, therefore, passed to the defendant Gorringe, the mortgagee. His LORDSHIP further decided that there was no right under the hire-purchase agreement to remove the engine. The plaintiff appealed. B

Dec. 19, 1896. A. L. SMITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court.— This case, though small as to the amount, raises a considerable question, which is whether a mortgagee of land in fee, when he enters upon the mortgaged premises, can take possession of an engine which is attached to the soil thereof by means of bolts and screws, although the engine did not and never had belonged to the mortgagor, but to a third party. E

[His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The question is whether Gorringe is entitled, under the above circumstances, to the gas engine. It is not disputed that he is entitled to the land, but the plaintiff, Hobson, denies that he is entitled to the gas engine upon the ground that it had never become King's property, and had always remained a chattel belonging to him, Hobson. F

There can be no doubt, upon a mortgage in fee of the land, that, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, the mortgagee is entitled to all fixtures which may be upon the land, whether placed there before or after the mortgage. If NORTH, J., in the passage in his judgment in Cumberland Union Banking Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron Co. (1) ([1892] 1 Ch. at p. 425), to which reference has been made, meant to hold otherwise, in our opinion he was in error, but we doubt if he intended so to hold. Gough v. Wood & Co. (2) decided in this court in no way assists the plaintiff in the case, and has no application to the present case. It was decided solely upon the ground that the mortgagee had acquiesced in the removal by the mortgagor during his tenancy of trade fixtures. For additional confirmation of the ratio decidendi of this case what was said by LINDLEY, L.J. ([1895] 2 Ch. at p. 282), and by KAY, L.J. (ibid. at p. 286), in Huddersfield Banking Co., Ltd., v. Henry Lister & Son Ltd. (3), may be referred to. Even if in the present case a licence had been granted by the defendant Gorringe to King to remove the gas engine during the continuance of a term (no evidence of which in fact existed), Gorringe, by entering and taking possession of the land and engine, would have determined such licence. G H I

We now come to the real point made on behalf of the plaintiff. It is this: it is said that this gas engine never was a fixture, but always remained a chattel, and consequently never passed to Gorringe as mortgagee of the land. It obviously did not pass to him as a chattel under the mortgage to him of "fixed machinery," for, if a chattel, it ever remained Hobson's, and never was the property of King; and unless Gorringe takes the engine as being part of the land mortgaged to him, he does not take it at all. Leaving out of consideration for the present the hire-

A purchase agreement of Jan. 7, 1895, there is a sequence of authorities which establish that the gas engine, affixed as it was and for the purpose for which it was to King's freehold, ceased to be a chattel, and became part of the freehold.

B Take first of all Wiltshier v. Cottrell (4), where the Court of Queen's Bench held that a threshing machine fixed by bolts and screws to posts which were let into the ground, and which machine could not be got out without disturbing some of the soil, would clearly pass under a conveyance of land and all fixtures. In Mather v. Fraser (5), which was a case between the assignee of a mortgagor and mortgagees, PAGE WOOD, V.-C., held that the machinery fixed to the land, whether by screws, solder, or other permanent means, passed to the mortgagees. Again, in Walmsley v. Milne (6), a case between a mortgagor and mortgagee in fee, C the Court of Common Pleas held that a steam engine and boiler and other implements secured by bolts and nuts to the wall, though they were all capable of being removed without injury either to the machinery or to the premises, were fixtures, and passed to the mortgagee as part of the freehold.

D In Climie v. Wood (7), a case between mortgagor and mortgagee in fee, the jury found that an engine and boiler which were used for sawing purposes (the engine being screwed down to planks upon the ground and the boiler being fixed to the brickwork) were trade fixtures, had been so fixed for their better use and not to improve the inheritance, and that they were removable without any appreciable damage to the freehold. The Court of Exchequer, nevertheless, held that the engine and boiler passed to the mortgagee, and this judgment was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber. WILLES, J., who delivered the judgment of the E court, stated that the reasons for a tenant with a limited interest being allowed to remove trade fixtures were not applicable to the owner of the fee. In Longbottom v. Berry (8), a case between assignees of a mortgagor and mortgagees, it was also held that machinery annexed to the floor of a building in a "quasi-permanent manner" by means of bolts and screws, passed to the mortgagees, and in 1872 the Exchequer Chamber, in Holland v. Hodgson (9), affirmed Mather v. Fraser (5) and Longbottom v. Berry (8), and held that looms attached by means of F nails driven through holes in the feet of the looms into the floors, which attachment was necessary to keep the looms steady when at work, and which nails could be drawn easily and without any serious damage to the flooring, formed part of the realty, and passed to the mortgagee in fee. If there had been in this case nothing but the existing visible degree of annexation of the gas engine to King's G freehold, and the known object for which such annexation had taken place, the authorities conclusively establish that the gas engine had ceased to be a chattel, and had become part of the freehold.

H But it was argued that the terms of the hire-purchase agreement caused this engine to remain a chattel, notwithstanding its annexation to the soil, for it was said that the intention of the parties who placed it where it was must be considered, and if this consideration showed that the intention was that the chattel was not to be a fixture, though actually fixed to the freehold, it still remained a chattel. In support of this argument a passage in the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., in the Exchequer Chamber in Holland v. Hodgson (9) was quoted, where he said (L.R. 7 C.P. at p. 335) when dealing with what were or were not fixtures :

I "Perhaps the true rule is that articles not otherwise attached to the land than by their own weight are not to be considered as part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to show that they were intended to be part of the land, the onus of showing that they were so intended lying on those who assert that they have ceased to be chattels; and that, on the contrary, an article which is affixed to the land even slightly is to be considered as part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to show that it was intended all along to continue a chattel, the onus lying on those who contend that it is a chattel."

The question in each case is whether the circumstances are sufficient to satisfy the onus. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff that the hire-purchase agreement shows an intention on Hobson's part, as also on King's part, that the gas engine should remain a chattel until King had paid the contracted instalments, which he never did. If the engine had been a trade fixture erected by King as tenant, with a limited interest, we apprehend that when affixed to the soil, as it was, it would have become a fixture—i.e., part of the soil, and would immediately have vested in the owner of the soil, subject to the right of King to remove it during his term. LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., in Bain v. Brand (10) says (1 App. Cas. at p. 722):

“Such is the general law. But an exception has been long established in favour of a tenant erecting fixtures for the purposes of trade, allowing him the privilege of removing them during the continuance of the term. When he brings any chattel to be used in his trade, and annexes it to the ground, it becomes a part of the freehold, but with a power, as between himself and his landlord, of bringing it back to the state of a chattel again by severing it from the soil. As the personal character of the chattel ceases when it is fixed to the freehold it can never be revived as long as it continues so annexed.”

It seems to us that the true view of the hire-purchase agreement, coupled with the annexation of the engine to the soil which took place in this case, is that the engine became a fixture—i.e., part of the soil—when it was annexed to the soil by screws and bolts subject as between Hobson and King to this, that Hobson had the right by contract to unfix it and take possession of it if King failed to pay him the contracted monthly instalments. In our opinion the engine became a fixture—i.e., part of the soil—subject to this right of Hobson which was given him by contract. But this right was not an easement created by deed, nor was it conferred by a covenant running with the land. The right, therefore, to remove the fixture imposed no legal obligation on any grantee from King of the land. Neither could the right be enforced in equity against any purchaser of the land without notice of the right, and the defendant Gorringer is such a purchaser. The plaintiff's right to remove the chattel if not paid for cannot be enforced against the defendant, who is not bound either at law or in equity by King's contract. The plaintiff's remedy for the price or for damages for the loss of the chattel is by action against King, or, he being bankrupt, by proof against his estate. This, in our judgment, is sufficient to determine this case in favour of the defendant, but, as another point has been stoutly argued on behalf of the plaintiff, we will deal with it.

It is said that the intention that the gas engine was not to become a fixture might be got out of the hire-purchase agreement, and, if so, it never became a fixture and part of the soil, and it was said that Holland v. Hodgson (9) had so decided. For this point it must be assumed that such intention is manifested by the hire-purchase agreement, though, as before stated, we think it is not. In Holland v. Hodgson (9), BLACKBURN, J., when dealing with the “circumstances to show intention,” was contemplating and referring to circumstances which showed the degree of annexation and the object of such annexation which were patent for all to see, and not to the circumstances of a chance agreement that might or might not exist between an owner of a chattel and a hirer thereof. This is made clear by the examples that BLACKBURN, J., alludes to to show his meaning. He takes as instances (a) blocks of stone placed in position as a dry stone wall, or stacked in a builder's yard; (b) a ship's anchor affixed to the soil, whether to hold a ship riding thereto, or to hold a suspension bridge. In each of these instances it will be seen that the circumstance to show intention is the degree and object of the annexation which is in itself apparent, and thus manifested the intention. BLACKBURN, J., in his proposed rule was not contemplating a hire-purchase agreement between the owner of a chattel and a hirer, or any other agreement unknown to either a vendee or mortgagee in fee of land, and the argument that such a consideration was to be entertained in our judgment is not well founded.

A It was further argued on behalf of the plaintiff that Wood v. Hewett (11) and Lancaster v. Eve (12) showed that the intention of the parties affixing a chattel to the soil must be ascertained when considering whether a chattel is or is not a fixture and part of the soil. In our opinion these cases do not show this, and, indeed, if they did, as before stated, if the hire-purchase agreement is considered it does not show what the plaintiff says it does. In Wood v. Hewett (11) the plaintiff, a miller, had put up a movable hatch, which worked up and down a groove in some immovable masonry and brickwork upon the defendant's land, and had so used it for years, the complaint against the defendant being that he had pulled up and taken away the hatch. The question was whether this movable hatch remained the plaintiff's or had become the property of the defendant. The jury found that this hatch remained the property of the plaintiff, and the court in banco held, as we read the case, that the jury were well warranted in finding that between the plaintiff and the defendant the former had become entitled to have the hatch which was his own property standing in the soil of the defendant; in other words, that it might be inferred that the plaintiff had acquired an easement of having his hatch on the defendant's land, and could, therefore, sue for interference therewith. There was no question in this case between a mortgagee and a third party.

D In Lancaster v. Eve (12) the plaintiff, who was a wharfinger, many years before the action was brought, had driven a pile into the bed of the Thames, which was the property of the Crown, for the purpose of carrying on the necessary business of his wharf, and for years and years had used this pile without interruption by anyone until the defendant's barge, by reason of the negligence of the defendant's servant, ran against it and carried it away. The point taken by the defendant was that the pile had been affixed to and formed part of the bed of the river, which was not the property of the plaintiff, and that, therefore, he could maintain no action for injury thereto; but the court held that, as between the plaintiff and the Crown, it ought to be inferred that, although the pile had been affixed in the soil of the river, yet it was so affixed by agreement between the plaintiff and the Crown that the former should have an easement over the Crown's property so as to be able to use the pile necessary for carrying on the business of the plaintiff's wharf. This is the point decided, though there are, and has been pointed out, some isolated passages as to the intention of persons when affixing a chattel to the soil. That the plaintiff had a cause of action in some form or other against the defendant cannot be denied, but if the case decided, as it is argued it did, that the pile remained a chattel, we do not agree with it. That a person can agree to affix a chattel to the soil of another so that it becomes part of that other's freehold, upon the terms that the one shall be at liberty in certain events to retake possession we do not doubt, but how a de facto fixture becomes not a fixture, or is not a fixture as regards a purchaser of land for value and without notice, by reason of some bargain between the affixers we do not understand, nor has any authority to support this contention been adduced.

H The point made as to the plate on the gas engine when delivered comes to nothing, for it is no more than an indication of what the agreement was between the plaintiff and King; and as there is no evidence whatever that the defendant was ever made aware of it, it cannot affect his right as mortgagee in fee of King's land. For the reasons above given we think that the gas engine became affixed to and was part of King's freehold, and thus passed to Gorringe as mortgagee in fee of King's land. I In our judgment KEKEWICH, J., was right when he gave judgment as he did for the defendant, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

By art. 2590 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada the assured under a policy of life assurance must have an insurable interest in the life upon which the assurance is effected, and he has an insurable interest in the life (i) of himself; (ii) of any person on whom he depends wholly or in part for support or education; (iii) of any person under legal obligation to him for the payment of money, or respecting property or services which death or illness might defeat or prevent the performance of; (iv) of any person on whose life any estate or interest in the assured depends. Under a policy of assurance by the deceased with the respondent company the amount of the assurance was made payable to the appellant. In reference to a question in the proposal for the policy as to the relation between the deceased and the appellant, the deceased stated "my protector, whenever I have need of it." A further condition in the policy was that, after the lapse of a year or upwards, the policy would be incontestable provided that the premiums had been duly paid. The appellant claimed to be entitled to the amount of the assurance.

Held: (i) the appellant was not a lawful holder since he had no insurable interest under art. 2590 of the Civil Code; (ii) the condition in the policy was no answer to an objection based on the Civil Code.

Chase-Casgrain, Q.C., and Grier (both of the Colonial Bar) for the respondents.

July 28, 1899. LORD WATSON.—This action was brought by the appellant, Joseph Napoléon Anctil, against the respondent company for recovery of the contents of a policy of assurance issued by the company on May 12, 1894, on the life of one Antoine Pettigrew. The amount of the assurance, which was for 2,000 dollars, was by the policy made payable to the appellant, his executors, administrators, and assigns, under deduction of the premium for the current year, on its being proved, to the satisfaction of the office, that the death of the assured had taken place whilst the policy was still current. One of the conditions of the policy which has led to the present controversy was in the following terms:

"Après que cette police aura été en vigueur une année entière, elle sera incontestable par rapport à quelque motif que ce soit, pourvu que les primes ici mentionnées aient été payées promptement, et que l'âge de l'assuré ait été admis."

It is unnecessary for the purposes of this appeal to refer to the other conditions, or bénéfices as they are termed, which are incorporated with the policy, which expressly bears that these conditions are applicable :

“Ainsi que les dispositions au verso de cette police, font aussi complètement partie de ce contrat que s'ils étaient énumérés au-dessus des signatures ci-dessus apposées.”

Antoine Pettigrew died on Oct. 6, 1895, when the policy had been current for more than a year, and the premiums had been regularly paid. The present action was raised by the appellant on Dec. 19, 1895.

In answering the proposals and queries submitted by the agent of the respondent company, which were thus referred to and made to form the basis of the contract of insurance, Antoine Pettigrew, in reply to the eighth question, which required him to give the name and address of the party who was to have the benefit of the contract, stated, “Joseph Napoléon Anctil, Rivière-du-Loup station.” To the ninth question, which had reference to the relation between him and that person, he replied, “Mon protecteur, si toutefois j'en ai besoin.” To the tenth question, which made the inquiry to whom he desired the benefit of the contract to accrue on the expiry of the period of dotation, which was at the end of fifteen years from the date of the policy, Antoine Pettigrew answered, “A moi-même.” It was argued for the appellant that the effect of the tenth answer was to give Antoine Pettigrew a proprietary interest in the policy. That may be so, but his interest was contingent on his surviving the date of the policy for a period of fifteen years. In the event of his death at any time during that period, the sole owner of the policy was the appellant.

By art. 2590 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada it is enacted in regard to life assurance :

“The insured must have an insurable interest in the life upon which the assurance is effected. He has an insurable interest in the life : (i) Of himself; (ii) Of any person upon whom he depends wholly or in part for support or education; (iii) Of any person under legal obligation to him for the payment of money, or respecting the property or services which death or illness might defeat or prevent the performance of; (iv) Of any person upon whose life any estate or interest in the insured depends.”

The only insurable interest which the appellant had in the life of Antoine Pettigrew, as stated in the proposals for insurance, was that the appellant was the protector of Pettigrew, whenever he stood in need of protection, which, if true, was an interest the very reverse of what is required by art. 2590 of the code.

The action led to a considerable amount of litigation. It was tried in the Supreme Court before CIMON, J., and a jury, who returned a verdict in the shape of answers to no less than twenty questions submitted to them by the learned judge. The verdict was then reported to the Superior Court sitting in review, consisting of CARON, ANDREWS, and CIMON, JJ. The appellant moved the court for judgment in his favour, while the respondent company moved for judgment non obstante veredicto, or for a new trial. CARON and ANDREWS, JJ. (dissentiente CIMON, J.), refused the appellant's motion, and granted a new trial on the ground (i) that, although the “incontestable” clause of the policy was a good answer to innocent misrepresentations, nevertheless (ii) it was not a good answer to the allegation that the policy was a wager policy; and (iii) that the policy was a wager policy, in which the appellant, the payee, had no insurable interest. An appeal was taken by the appellant to the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, when five learned judges unanimously reversed the judgment of the Superior Court sitting in review, and entered judgment for the appellant, on the ground that (i) “the one year clause” was a good answer to alleged innocent misrepresentations, and (ii) the jury had found on the evidence that the policy had been taken out by Pettigrew, and not by the appellant. The respondent company then appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, who, on Dec. 9, 1897 (SEDGWICK, J., dissenting) reversed the order of the Queen's Bench, dismissed the appellant's action, and entered judgment for the respondent company. The learned judges of the Supreme Court were of opinion (i) that the policy was null and void, having been entered into with the appellant in his own name, for his own benefit, and he having no insurable interest in the life of Pettigrew; (ii) that "the one year clause" was contrary to public law and order; and that the respondent company were not estopped by "the one year clause," or otherwise, from disputing the validity of the policy. Their Lordships have now to determine whether the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada ought to be affirmed simpliciter, or whether there ought to be judgment entered for the appellant, or the case sent back for a new trial.

In considering these two last questions, it is legitimate to refer to the evidence led before the jury, for the purpose of ascertaining whether, on a second trial, the facts found by the jury, bearing on the insurable interest of the appellant, are capable of substantial or any modification. Their Lordships are satisfied that, were a new trial allowed, these findings would be strengthened as against the appellant, but could not be modified in his favour. They have also arrived at the conclusion that the facts as found by the jury are, in the circumstances of this case, sufficient to show that the appellant had no insurable interest in the life of Antoine Pettigrew. In the first place, it must be observed that, although the terms of the policy, and of the proposals on which it is based, are such as to cast on him the onus of proving that he had an insurable interest, the appellant has not in his pleadings alleged, and has not attempted to establish by proof, that he possessed any such interest as is required by art. 2590 of the code. The only contribution, if it can be so called, to that inquiry made by the testimony of the appellant, consisted in the assertion that his wife's grandmother was the cousin-german of Antoine Pettigrew. That is the evidence on which the jury, in answer to question 8 (b) found that there was "distant relationship" between Pettigrew and the appellant. The jury, in answer to question 2 (a), found that all the premiums in the policy had been regularly paid up to the death of Antoine Pettigrew; in answer to question 5, that Pettigrew was, at the time of the policy, and since, a poor man without any means whatsoever; and, in answer to question 6 (d), that it was the appellant who paid all the premiums. In answer to question 3 (a) and (b), they found that Pettigrew had signed the application for the policy with his mark of a cross, in presence of Hélène Ouellet, as witness, she being the wife of the appellant.

In his evidence, the appellant explains that, at the foot of the application, he wrote the signature Antoine Pettigrew, on either side of the mark made by Pettigrew, who could not write. The most important findings of the jury are contained in their answers to question 15. These are to the effect that: (i) Before the issuing of the policy sued on, the respondent company had, on the same application, issued another payable to Antoine Pettigrew and his representatives; (ii) that Antoine Pettigrew and the appellant refused the first policy, having in lieu and place thereof exacted the policy sued on; and (iii) that it was the appellant, and not Antoine Pettigrew, who refused the first policy and exacted the second. In his evidence, the appellant thus explains his reasons for declining the first policy—"Parce qu'elle était payable à Pettigrew ou ses héritiers"; and also his reason for exacting the second—"que si la compagnie défenderesse voulait émaner une police payable à moi directment, que j'en paierais les primes, autrement que je n'en voulais pas." Their Lordships are of opinion, with the majority of the learned judges of the Supreme Court, that the findings of the jury are in themselves sufficient to establish that the appellant is not a lawful holder of the policy in question, within the meaning of art. 2590 of the code.

The question remains whether that clause of the policy which provides that the instrument shall become "incontestable" on the lapse of a period of a year or upwards, during which premiums are regularly paid, furnishes a good answer to the objection founded on the terms of the code. On that point, their Lordships

A concur in the opinion expressed by the majorities of the Supreme Court, and of the Superior Court sitting in review. The rule of the code appears to them to be one which rests on general principles of public policy or expediency, and which cannot be defeated by the private convention of the parties. Any other view would lead to the sanction of wager policies.

B Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment appealed from, and to dismiss the appeal. The appellant must pay to the respondent company their costs of this appeal.

WILLIAMS v. BARMOUTH URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL

[77 L.T. 383]

Local Authority—Contract—Need to be under seal—Compromise in settlement of dispute arising under contract made under seal.

G

On Jan. 14, 1890, a local authority contracted for the construction of a sewer extension. The contract was made under the common seal of the authority (pursuant to s. 174 of the Public Health Act, 1875) and contained the usual power for the engineer who had the control and supervision of the work to vary, alter, enlarge or diminish any of it. The engineer directed an alteration, and in August, 1893, he certified that the work had been completed. In September, 1893, the contractor presented his final account and a dispute arose over the claim for the substituted work. At a meeting of the local authority held on Nov. 9, 1894, the contractor offered to accept a specified sum as a compromise in full settlement of his claim. This the authority orally agreed to accept, but subsequently resisted on the ground that the settlement had not been made under seal.

Held: (i) the variation had been validly made without being under seal as it had been made under the power conferred on the engineer in pursuance of a contract made under seal; (ii) the compromise was not required to be made under seal within s. 174 of the Public Health Act, 1875, as a compromise made in settlement of a dispute which had arisen under a contract made under seal need not be under seal; and, therefore, the contractor's claim was valid.

Appeal by the defendant local authority against an order of the Divisional Court (LAWRANCE and COLLINS, JJ.), dismissing the motion of the local authority to remit or set aside the award of an arbitrator.

In 1889, the Barmouth Local Board, the predecessors of the Barmouth Urban District Council, resolved to extend the town's outfall sewer, and having obtained the necessary authority to borrow money for the purpose of the scheme, accepted the tender of Abraham Williams, the contractor. By a contract under the common seal of the local authority, dated Jan. 14, 1890, the contractor agreed to erect, construct, build, execute, and carry out all the works required in the extension of the outfall sewer and works connected therewith, at Rô-ddu, Barmouth, in accordance with the plans, detail drawings, and specification, prepared by the engineer named, for £2,450; and he thereby further agreed to conform to and be bound by the general conditions, provisions, and stipulations of the specification. The specification provided (inter alia) as follows :

"1. The contract to be entered into under this specification includes all the works required in the extension out to sea for a distance of 375 yards or thereabouts, of the existing cast-iron outfall sewer at Rô-ddu, and the filling of the settling tanks with the necessary alterations to main sewers and manholes, and works connected therewith. . . . 2. The contractor must satisfy himself of the nature of the sea bottom into which piles are to be driven, of the soil and strata to be excavated, the direction and extent of the tidal currents, prevailing winds, and generally of everything which may in any way influence his tender. . . . 6. The whole of the works shall be under the control and supervision of the engineer, who shall have full power to vary, alter, enlarge, or diminish any of them. Such alterations, whether additions or deductions, shall not annul this contract, but shall be allowed for according to the rates or prices in the schedule hereto annexed, and added to or deducted from the amount of contract, as the case may be. Should any alterations be made to which the schedule of prices does not apply, the engineer shall fix their value."

Under the original scheme the pipes were to be secured on the bed of the sea by piles; but, owing to the hard and rocky nature of the sea bottom, it was subsequently considered advisable by the engineer that they should be secured by anchors attached to stones, and he gave directions to that effect. This variation of the contract involved the use of barges to a much larger extent than was provided for by the original arrangement. In August, 1893, the engineer certified that the works had been completed, and in September that year the contractor sent in his final accounts, in which a very large portion of the total sum claimed was for the substituted work.

Disputes arose between the local authority and the contractor concerning the amount to which he was entitled under the contract. On Nov. 9, 1894, at a meeting of the local authority, at which the contractor was present, he offered to accept £1,080 without interest as a compromise, and in full settlement of all claims by him against the local authority. This offer was orally accepted by the local authority, and after payment of £120 14s. 2d. part of the contractor's claim, the balance then agreed to be due by the local authority to the contractor was £959 5s. 10d., which the local authority agreed to pay within six months. Subsequently the local authority, as they alleged, discovered that the pipes under the sea were many yards short of the stipulated length, and on that ground decided to resist the contractor's claim. In November, 1895, the contractor commenced an

A action to recover £959 5s. 10d., the balance due under the compromise and settlement between him and the local authority. Alternatively he claimed the same amount as due to him under the contract of Jan. 14, 1890. The local authority denied the alleged debt and liability. By a deed, dated Nov. 6, 1896, made between the contractor and the local authority it was mutually agreed that the matters in dispute should be submitted to arbitration. The arbitrator duly made his award, B in which he found that a settlement had been arrived at under which the local authority was liable to pay the contractor £959 5s. 10. The Divisonal Court having dismissed the motion of the local authority to remit or set aside the arbitrator's award, the local authority appealed.

Asquith, Q.C., and Llewelyn Williams for the local authority.

C Channell, Q.C., and Griffith Jones for the contractor.

SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R.—The substantial question which we have to consider in this case turns on the true construction of cl. 1 and 6 of the contract entered into in Jan. 14, 1890, under the common seal of the local authority of Barmouth. The contract related to the construction of certain works required in the extension out to sea of the existing outfall sewer at Rô-ddu, Barmouth. The D precise nature of the work to be done is stated in the first article of the specification. That is the subject-matter of the contract. It appears that the work was to be executed in a particular way. Piles were to be driven into the sea bottom and the sewer was to be fastened to the piles. Clause 6 of the specification provided for supervision by the authority's engineer. That is the bargain. It was found that E the sea bottom was so rocky and hard that the original scheme was considered impracticable. Accordingly, the engineer directed alterations and variations of the contract, and he said that the sewer pipes must be secured by anchors attached to stones, instead of being secured under the sea by piles as originally intended.

Is it possible to say that that is not such a variation as was contemplated and authorised by cl. 6 of the specification? I think not. It seems to me that it is F quite possible that the change of object might have been so radical that it might not fairly be regarded as an alteration of the kind contemplated. But this alteration was, I think, fairly an alteration covered by cl. 6 of the specification. All that was done here was done under the power conferred on the engineer by that clause, and consequently in pursuance of a contract which was under seal. That is of the utmost importance. We have, therefore, that ground to stand on. The work having been G done in accordance with the altered plan, some controversy arose between the parties as to what was owing to the contractor in respect of the work done under the contract. A verbal compromise and settlement of the disputes which had arisen was arrived at in November, 1894. It is objected that that compromise was not under the seal of the local authority.

We are all familiar with the common law doctrine by which a contract entered into by a corporation must be under the seal of the corporation. The matter has so often been thrashed out in the courts that it is not necessary to discuss it now. But it seems to me that, where disputes have arisen under a contract under seal, a compromise of those disputes need not be under seal also. There is nothing improper or wrong in the mere fact that the parties have verbally adjusted their disputes. It seems to me, therefore, that the award binds the parties to this arbitration, the arbitrator having had distinct authority to make it. There are, consequently, absolutely no grounds for referring the award back to the arbitrator. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CHITTY, L.J.—In this case a contract was made for the construction of certain sewerage works. It contained the usual clause conferring on the engineer who had the management of the contract the customary power to vary, alter, enlarge, or diminish any of the works, and such alterations were not to annul the contract. There was a variation directed by the engineer. The argument is, that that variation was of such a character that it ought therefore to have been under seal. I do not think so. The works were executed in accordance with the variation made in a contract under seal. The claim of the contractor was sent in and considered by the local authority, and disputes having arisen between the parties a verbal compromise was come to. It is said that it should have been under the seal of the local authority, inasmuch as the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 174, requires that all contracts made by an urban authority, whereof the value or amount exceeds £50, shall be under the seal of such authority. There is, however, no decision to that effect in the books, and I should be very sorry to introduce any such a doctrine. I agree, therefore, that the appeal fails and must be dismissed, with costs.

Will—Apportionment—Tenant for life and remainderman—Trustees' power of sale "if and when they shall consider it expedient"—Reversionary interest—Exclusion of rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth.

By his will dated Nov. 3, 1876, a testator gave all his property to trustees on trust to pay the income to his mother during her life, with remainder to named persons. There was no express direction to sell or convert. The will contained powers for the trustees to manage the estate, and, if and when they thought fit, to sell. Part of the testator's estate consisted of reversionary interests under settlements of personal estate of which his mother was tenant for life. The testator died on Feb. 3, 1880, and his mother on Oct. 17, 1894, when the reversionary interests fell into possession. One of the mother's executors took out a summons to determine whether the reversion ought to have been sold at the testator's death, and whether her executors were entitled to any payment out of the trust fund in respect of the income which she would have received if the reversions had been sold.

Held: the rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (1) applied only where the testator had expressed no intention as to the time for the realisation of his estate; the discretion given to the trustees to sell if and when they thought fit was inconsistent with an intention that a reversion should be sold at the testator's death; and, therefore, the rule did not apply, and the executors were not entitled to any part of the proceeds of the reversionary interests.

Summons.

By a trust disposition and settlement in the Scots form dated Nov. 3, 1876, Cecil Colvin Pitcairn gave all and sundry his whole means and estate, heritable and movable, real and personal, wherever situated or addebted, presently belonging or which should belong or be addebted to him at the time of his death, to three trustees in trust for the following uses and purposes: (i) from the produce of his means and estate to pay all his just and lawful debts and funeral expenses, and the expenses of executing the trusts; (ii) to pay over to his mother in the event of her surviving him, during all the days of her life after his decease, the whole interest, dividends, and other annual produce and profits of the trust estate for her alimentary use, or otherwise to permit and empower his mother to receive the same interests, dividends, and other annual produce and profits. The third, fourth, fifth and sixth clauses directed the trustees as soon as convenient after the testator's death, if his mother predeceased him or after her death if she survived him, to pay certain legacies amounting to £29,000 and to provide for an annuity of £50. The seventh clause directed that the trustees should pay and deliver all such other legacies, gifts, or provisions as should be contained in any codicil; that if it should happen that after payment of his debts the expenses of the trust and certain legacies therein declared to be preferable the proceeds of his estate should on realisation prove insufficient for the full payment of the other legacies, such legacies should abate rateably, and with regard to the residue and remainder, if any, of his means and estate after implementing the foregoing purposes he directed his trustees to pay, assign, and convey it to the Bishops of Edinburgh and St. Andrews to be applied by them for the benefit of the Scottish Episcopal Church or of such charitable institutions in connection therewith as they might think proper. The testator conferred on his trustees the following powers and privileges: power to enter into the possession and management of his estate and effects, and to call, sue for, uplift, receive, and discharge the rents and duties, interest, dividends, and annual profits arising from the same; powers to appoint factors, and for any one of the trustees who might be so appointed to charge for his services; if and when they should consider it expedient, full power to sell and dispose of all or any part of the estate and effects either by public roup or private bargain at such price as they should think proper; power to invest the trust funds in the securities therein mentioned. A

The testator died on Feb. 3, 1880, domiciled in England, and the trust disposition was proved as a will in England on April 21, 1880, by two of the trustees. The testator's mother survived him, dying on Oct. 12, 1894.

At the time of the testator's death his estate consisted of personal estate of the value of about £13,000 and of certain reversionary interests expectant on the death of his mother in trust funds, amounting to about £30,000, of which she was tenant for life under a settlement made on her marriage and various wills. During the life of the testator's mother the trustees of his will paid to her the income of the property to which he was entitled in possession, but they did not sell any of the reversions. C

One of the mother's executors took out a summons against the trustees of the testator's will to determine whether the mother was entitled on the death of the testator to have so much of his estate as consisted of the reversionary interests (which fell into possession on but not before her own death) sold, and the income of the proceeds paid to her for her life, and whether her executors were entitled to a payment out of the estate of the testator in respect of such income. NORTH, J.—The point in this case is a short one, and interesting, and not free from difficulty. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:] The representatives of the mother say that, the reversion having fallen in, they are entitled to so much of the proceeds of keeping the reversion, that is so much of the settled fund as represents the income that she would have received if the reversion had been realised under the son's will, the proceeds invested and the income paid to her for life. The question simply is, whether her fund is entitled to have out of the settled estate something to represent the income of the reversion during the fourteen years which she survived her son. F

The rule of the court is, I think, very clearly settled; and it will be sufficient if I refer, at first at any rate, to the well-known case of Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (1). [His LORDSHIP read the passage from LORD ELDON's judgment, 7 Ves. at p. 148, from the words, "It is given as personal estate" . . . to . . . "the interest of its present worth." ] That is dealing shortly with the case in which there is a wasting security when the tenant for life enjoying it in specie would receive more than his share, or a reversionary interest when the tenant for life would receive less than his share even if he received anything at all. In Morgan v. Morgan (2) SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., says (14 Beav. at pp. 81, 82): H

"Now the rule of law as applicable to these cases is not, I think, open to doubt, although the application of the rule to particular cases may be and frequently is a matter of very considerable difficulty." I

"The rule has been since affirmed as often as it has been referred to, and is unquestionably the law. But the testator may take the case of any particular bequest out of this rule; and the effect of the later cases has been to allow small indications of intention to prevent the application of the rule. The

A question here, as in similar cases, is one of construction, whether the testator has in this will expressed his intention that this rule shall not apply to this particular case. It has been urged by the petitioners that the burden of proof does not lie upon them more than on the respondents, and that being a question of construction it is for the court to look into the will and discover the testator's real meaning. In one sense this is certainly true; but still, in my opinion, the rule of law is, that, unless there can be gathered from the will some expression of intention that the property is to be enjoyed in specie, the rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (1) is to prevail. It is, therefore, incumbent on the persons contesting the application of that rule, and on the court which forbids that application, to point out the words in the will that exclude it, and if this cannot be done the rule must apply. The reported decisions on the subject are useful, as they form a guide to enable the court to ascertain what directions contained in a will are properly considered to be an expression by the testator of his intention that this rule is not to apply. In no case that I have been able to find has the mere absence of any direction to convert his property been construed to mean that it should be enjoyed in specie by the legatees in succession; and the contrary must have been decided, though not expressly so stated, in Johnson v. Johnson (3). There are several cases in which the court held that the rule was excluded where the testator has fixed the period of conversion; as, for instance, where he has given the property to one for life, and after the death of that person has directed the property to be sold and divided";

E and then, after referring to one or two cases I need not dwell upon, the Master of the Rolls says (ibid. at p. 84) :

"I think, therefore, that the absence of this direction [that is, a direction to convert], cannot be treated as an expression of intention on the part of the testator that his property was never to be converted; it would, I think, be unreasonable if it was so held. By law the property must be converted; a testator may not unreasonably be supposed to be cognisant of that law, and to have given no direction on the subject because he may have supposed that it would be mere surplusage so to do."

G There are two cases laying down the general rule, one of which is Hinves v. Hinves (4), where WIGRAM, V.-C., after referring to the rule of the court in the absence of any expression of intention, used these words, which seem to be very much in point (3 Hare, at p. 611) :

H "But, if the will expresses an intention that the property as it existed at the death of the testator shall be enjoyed in specie, although the property be not, in a technical sense, specifically bequeathed, to such a case the rule does not apply. The rule is settled with sufficient clearness. The difficulty only arises in its application to particular cases, where the intention of the testator is expressed with more or less distinctness."

In Pickup v. Atkinson (5) the same judge puts it very shortly. He says (4 Hare, at p. 628) :

I "Cases calling for a decision on this question have arisen in each branch of the court within the last few years, and in each branch of the court the rule appears to have been stated in the same way. If the will manifests an intention that the general residue of the estate shall be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and there is nothing to qualify that simple intention, the court, in order to effectuate it, converts so much of the testator's estate as is of a perishable nature (under which head leasehold property falls) into investments of a permanent kind."

And, of course, although he does not state the alternative, it converts reversionary property on similar principles. Then he says :

“But if the intention of the testator appears to be, that the first taker shall enjoy the property in that state in which it exists at his death, the court is bound to give effect to that intention.”

I take it, therefore, that it is clear from those and numerous other cases that the question is what the testator intends, and his intention must be gathered from his will. He has a right to say what is to be done; and intention as expressed or to be deduced from the terms of his will must be followed. But if he has given no direction on the subject, then the court has a rule that it applies. Looking at the present will, the testator first of all devises and bequeaths to certain trustees all his real and personal estate, and then proceeds to declare the trusts. It is apparent that the will was prepared by someone who was more familiar with Scottish terms than English, but there is no difficulty in following it. The testator says :

“First, my trustees shall from the produce of my means and estate pay all my just and lawful debts and funeral expenses and the expenses of executing the trust.”

His means and estate, of course, denote everything of which he died possessed. It was said that this was to be done at once, and points to an immediate conversion. But the expenses of executing the trusts could not all be disposed of in the first instance; they would continue until the estate was wound-up. Then the next is this. [His LORDSHIP read the second clause, and proceeded.] There is a reference there to an actual receipt of what is produced by the estate as it stood. The trustees may not only pay it over to the mother, but may allow her herself to receive the income that it produces, letting her do what they might do, and she, of course, would not as tenant for life have power to convert the estate. As far as that clause goes it looks rather against there being any direction that anything not producing income was to be converted in order that the proceeds might produce income, but I think it deserves very little weight. The third, fourth and fifth clauses direct the payment of legacies amounting together to £29,800. Then, sixthly, there is a direction to set apart a sum sufficient to provide for an annuity of £50 a year; and, seventhly : [His LORDSHIP read the seventh clause.] At that time the testator was plainly contemplating that besides the legacies he had mentioned there might be others given by a will or equivalent instrument which would have to be paid out of the estate.

He is not, therefore, dealing with this sum of £29,800, as it was suggested he is, as a sum corresponding with the value of the reversion which would fall in on his mother's death, but a sum which he contemplated might be increased by other legacies being added to it. It is plain also that at this point he is contemplating a realisation of his estate. But, in my opinion, realisation there means the conversion of the investments, of which the estate then consisted, into money for the purpose of paying legacies and paying over the residue; and the use of the word does not throw any light on the question with which I have to deal, that is, whether this reversion ought to have been converted at the testator's death. Then there is a direction to pay, assign, and convey the property to certain persons upon charitable trusts, which I need not read. The direction is not to pay over certain moneys, but to pay, assign and convey the property. Counsel for the executor says that may apply to real estate which he might acquire subsequently to the date of his will. It certainly might apply to that, but the phrase “assign and convey” seems to me to point to something which is to be the result of no conversion taking place because it could not apply to handing over the proceeds of sale.

Then there are some powers for executing the trusts. The testator says :

“I hereby confer on my trustees the following powers and privileges, viz. : with power to my trustees to enter into the possession and management of my said estate and effects.”

A He is dealing with a trust to be exercised and executed by the trustees during the continuance of the trust, and here he uses this phrase, "of my said estate and effects," which is the same phrase which he used in the beginning of the will with reference to what it was out of which debts and funeral expenses are to be paid. Then he goes on giving power to the trustees

B "to enter into the possession of and management of my said estate and effects, and to call, sue for, uplift, receive, and discharge the rents and annual profits arising from the same," and to make titles, and so on, and to employ factors, agents, or cashiers "for managing my said means and estate"; that is referring to what is to take place during the continuance of the trust. Therefore, they are to manage here what was clearly an unconverted estate, the same estate which was described at the beginning of the will. Then, farther on, there is this power,

C "with full power to sell and dispose of all or any part of my said estate and effects hereby conveyed, and that either by public roup or private bargain, and at such price or prices as they may think proper."

D Then, farther on, there is a direction as to the securities in which funds may be invested. That clause seems to be the clue to the meaning of the will; and I think that this power given by the testator to the trustees to sell and dispose "if and when they think it may be expedient" means that they are to have the power of selling if they think fit, and that, if they have power to do it if they think fit, they necessarily have the power not to do it unless they think fit.

E It seems to me on the authorities that there are several cases that show that, where a testator has intended that a conversion is to take place at some time or other than that at which the rule of the court would make conversion necessary, he has dealt with the question of conversion, and the rule of the court has no application. I read the passage in Morgan v. Morgan (2) in which SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., pointed out that the rule was excluded where the testator has fixed the period of conversion. In the present case he has not fixed it in that sense, but he has given the option of saying when the conversion is to take place to some other persons, which seems to me to be equally effective in negating what is called the rule of the court which would require that conversion to take place immediately, or as soon as possible after the death of the testator. No doubt in the illustration given in Morgan v. Morgan (2) a time is fixed as at the death of a particular person, but there are two or three cases where the same rule has been applied where a particular time is not fixed. One of them was Alcock v. Slopier. [His LORDSHIP read the words of the gift in that case, and proceeded.] In his judgment, after referring to Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (1), SIR JOHN LEACH, M.R., says (2 My. & K. at p. 702):

G "It is with a view to this principle that the present will is to be examined. The testator gives the residuary estate to trustees 'upon trust to permit his wife to receive the rents, profits, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof for her own sole and separate use during her life.' There is here no intimation of an intention that any part of the property should be immediately converted by the trustees, but the inference rather is that the trustees during the life of the wife were to be merely passive; and the term dividends has reference to the long annuities. After the death of his wife he directs his trustees to sell his freehold house in Oxford Street, and also his leasehold houses, by auction. The leasehold houses, like the long annuities, were a wasting property, and he has plainly expressed his intention that they should not be sold during the life of his wife, and that is manifestly inconsistent with the general notion on his part that the wasting portion of his residuary estate was immediately to be converted into permanent property."

He quotes the passage in the will directing that Mr. Abbott should be employed to A convert the property and to distribute the same, and says :

“The testator could not have meant that Mr. Abbott should convert the whole of his property after the death of his wife if he had intended that any part of it should be converted during her life. The widow is, therefore, entitled to enjoy during her life”

what? Not the income of the leasehold and freehold houses only, but the income of B the other wasting property, viz., the long annuities.

In Burton v. Mount (6) there was a general gift of the testator's real and personal estate, upon trust to pay the income to his son for life, and after his death for his children, and the testator empowered his trustees,

at any time or times, or from time to time at their discretion, to make sale and dispose of the freehold and leasehold estates or any of them (except as therein mentioned) by public auction or private contract,” and so on. KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., came to the conclusion that, as there was this discretion given to the trustees as to the time at which they were to sell, it was D inconsistent with the intention of the testator that the property should be sold under the rule of the court immediately, and he decided the point as well as to the lease-holds as to the long annuities in favour of the tenant for life. Again, Re Sewell's Estate (7) seems to me to be exactly in point.

These cases seem to be to show that, when the time of sale is fixed, either by reference to a given number of years after the testator's death or to the falling in of E a life or anything of that kind, or when it is left to the discretion of somebody else to say when the sale is to take place, the testator has by his will provided for the sale, and therefore there is no rule of the court requiring the sale in a different way or under different circumstances to those indicated by the testator's will. I find here a direction that the trustees are to have full power, if and when they consider F it expedient, to sell and dispose of all or any part of the estate and effects. It seems to me that that gives them a discretion, in the exercise of that power, to regulate the time of sale which is inconsistent with and negatives any intention that the court should realise the reversion in the way in which it would do if there had been no such direction. In my opinion, therefore, as the trustees did in fact allow the reversion to remain unsold, the estate of the tenant for life is not entitled G to any part of the proceeds of this reversionary interest now that it has fallen into possession.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR CANADA v. ATTORNEYS-GENERAL FOR ONTARIO, QUEBEC AND NOVA SCOTIA. AND CROSS APPEALS

[Reported [1898] A.C. 700; 67 L.J.P.C. 90; 78 L.T. 697]

Canada—Dominion and provincial legislation—Legislative jurisdiction and proprietary rights over waters—Rivers and lake improvements—Public harbours—Fisheries and fishing—British North America Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict., c. 3), ss. 91, 92, 108, Sched. 3.

There is no presumption that because legislative jurisdiction in respect of particular subject-matters was vested in the Dominion Parliament by the British North America Act, 1867, proprietary rights were thereby transferred to it.

On its true construction the transfer by s. 108 and Sched. 3 of the Act of 1867 to the Dominion of "rivers and lake improvements" relates only to improvements of rivers and lakes and not to entire rivers. Such construction does no violence to the language used and is probably in accordance with the intention of the legislature.

Public harbours are vested in the Dominion, but it does not follow that, because a foreshore on the margin of a harbour is Crown property it necessarily forms part of the harbour.

Section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, does not convey to the Dominion of Canada any proprietary rights in relation to fisheries, although the legislative jurisdiction conferred on it by s. 91 of the Act of 1867 might enable it to affect proprietary rights to an unlimited extent, short of transferring them to others. A tax by way of licence as a condition of the right to fish is within the power conferred on the Dominion legislature by s. 91 (4) and (12), and a similar power conferred on the provincial legislature by s. 92 cannot derogate from that power. In so far as s. 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 95 (1886), empower the grant of exclusive fishing rights over provincial property, it is ultra vires the Dominion. Section 47 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, c. 24 (1860), is, with a specific exception, intra vires the province. Regulations restricting the public right of fishing are by s. 91 (12) of the Act of 1867, within the exclusive competence of the Dominion Parliament, and therefore such regulations in the Ontario Act, 1892, are ultra vires; but it does not follow that the legislation of a provincial legislature is incompetent merely because it may have relation to fisheries.

The Dominion Parliament has jurisdiction to pass Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 92 (1886) dealing with "works constructed in or over navigable waters."

The Judicial Committee will not deal with questions affecting the rights of persons not parties to the litigation.

(1.) Did the beds of all lakes, rivers, public harbours, and other waters, or any and which of them, situate within the territorial limits of the several provinces, and not granted before confederation, become under the British North America Act the property of the Dominion or the property of the province in which the same respectively are situate, and is there in that respect any and what distinction between the various classes of waters, whether salt waters or fresh waters, tidal or non-tidal, navigable or non-navigable, or between the so-called great lakes, such as Lakes Superior, Huron, Erie, etc., and the other lakes, or the so-called great rivers, such as the St. Lawrence River, the Richelieu, the Ottawa, etc., and other rivers, or between waters directly and immediately connected with the sea coast and waters not so connected, or between other waters and waters separating (and so far as they do separate) two or more provinces of the Dominion from one another, or between other waters and waters separating (and so far as they do separate) the Dominion from the territory of a foreign nation? (2.) Is the Act of the Dominion Parliament, Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 32, intituled, "An Act respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters," an Act which the Dominion Parliament had jurisdiction to pass either in whole or in part? (3.) If not, in case the bed and banks of a lake or navigable river belong to a province, and the province makes a grant of land extending into the lake or river for the purpose of there being built thereon a wharf, warehouse, or the like, has the grantee a right to build thereon accordingly, subject to the work not interfering with the navigation of the lake or river? (4.) In case the bed of a public harbour or any portion of the bed of a public harbour at the time of confederation had been granted by the Crown, has the province a like jurisdiction in regard to the making a grant as and for the purpose in preceding paragraph stated, subject to not thereby interfering with navigation, or other full use of the harbour as a harbour, and subject to any Dominion legislation within the competence of the Dominion Parliament?

(5.) Had riparian proprietors before confederation an exclusive right of fishing in non-navigable lakes, rivers, streams, and waters, the beds of which had been granted to them by the Crown? (6.) Has the Dominion Parliament jurisdiction to authorise the giving by lease, licence, or otherwise to lessees, licensees, or other grantees, the right of fishing in such waters as mentioned in the last question, or any, and which of them? (7.) Has the Dominion Parliament exclusive jurisdiction to authorise the giving by lease, licence, or otherwise to lessees, licensees, or other grantees, the right of fishing in such waters as mentioned in the last question, or any, and which of them? (8.) Has the Dominion Parliament such jurisdiction as regards navigable or non-navigable waters, the beds and banks of which are assigned to the provinces respectively under the British North America Act, if any such are so assigned? (9.) If the Dominion Parliament has such jurisdiction as mentioned in the preceding three questions, has a provincial legislature jurisdiction for the purpose of provincial revenue or otherwise to require the dominion lessee, licensee, or other grantee to take out a provincial licence also?

(10.) Had the Dominion Parliament jurisdiction to pass s. 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 95, intituled "An Act respecting fisheries and fishing," or any other of the provisions of the said Act, or any, and which of such several sections, or any, and what parts thereof respectively? (11.) Had the Dominion Parliament jurisdiction to pass s. 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 95, intituled "An Act respecting fisheries and fishing," or any other of the provisions of the said Act, so far as these respectively relate to fishing in waters, the beds of which do not belong to the dominion, and are not Indian lands? (12.) If not, has the Dominion Parliament any jurisdiction in respect of fisheries, except to pass general laws not derogating from the property in the lands constituting the beds of such waters as aforesaid, or from the rights incident to the ownership by the provinces and others, but (subject to such property and rights) providing in the interests of the owners and the public, for the regulation, protection, improvement, and preservation of fisheries, as for example, but forbidding fish to be taken at improper seasons, preventing the undue destruction of fish by taking them in an improper manner, or with improper engines, prohibiting obstructions in ascending rivers, and the like? (13.) Had the legislature of Ontario jurisdiction to enact s. 47 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, c. 24, intituled "An Act respecting the sale and management of public lands"; and ss. 5 to 13, both inclusive, and ss. 19 to 21, both inclusive, of the Ontario Act, 1892, intituled: "An Act for the protection of the provincial fisheries," or any and which of such several sections, or any and what parts thereof respectively? (14.) Had the legislature of Quebec jurisdiction to enact ss. 1375 to 1378 inclusive of the Revised Statutes of Quebec, or any and which of the said sections, or any and what parts thereof? (15.) Had a province jurisdiction to legislate in regard to providing fishways in dams, slides, and other constructions, and otherwise to regulate and protect fisheries within the province, subject to and so far as may consist with any laws passed by the Dominion Parliament within its constitutional competence? (16.) Has the Dominion Parliament power to declare what shall be deemed an interference with navigation and require its sanction to any work, or erection in or filling up of navigable waters? (17.) Had riparian proprietors, before confederation, an exclusive right of fishing in navigable non-tidal lakes, rivers, streams, and waters, the beds of which had been granted to them by the Crown?

At the hearing of the case before the Supreme Court of Canada (STRONG, C.J., and TASCHERAU, GWYNNE, KING, and GIROUARD, JJ.), the judges were unable to agree and delivered separate written opinions. The opinions of the majority of the judges were to the effect that the beds of all ungranted waters situate within the territorial limits of a province were the property of such province and not of the Dominion, with the exception only of public harbours, as to which the decision in Holman v. Green (1) was binding; that the provincial governments alone had power to grant leases and licences as to fishing in such waters; that the jurisdiction of the Dominion as to fisheries was limited to passing general laws which, without derogating from the property in the bed of such waters or from the rights incident to the ownership thereof might provide in the interest of the owners and the public for the regulation, protection, improvement, and preservation of fisheries, and that the provincial legislatures had jurisdiction to make regulations as to fisheries within their respective provinces so far as such regulations were not inconsistent with and were not superseded by Dominion legislation. With reference to the statutes referred to in questions 2, 10, 11, 13, and 14, the majority of the judges were of opinion that the Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 92, "An Act respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters" was intra vires, and that the Dominion Parliament had power to declare what should be deemed an interference with navigation and require its sanction to any work or erection in, or filling up of navigable waters, but that as regards the Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 95, "An Act respecting fisheries and fishing," s. 4, when enforced outside Dominion waters, and ss. 14 (1), 21 (1) (2) (3) and 23 were ultra vires; that s. 47 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, c. 24, "An Act respecting the sale and management of public lands, ss. 5 to 13 and 19 to 21 of 55 & 56 Vict., c. 10, "An Act for the protection of the provincial fisheries," and ss. 1375 to 1378 of the Revised Statutes of Quebec (51 & 52 Vict., c. 17) were, intra vires, provided that an so long as they did not conflict with Dominion legislation. The Attorney-General for the Dominion, the Attorney-General for Ontario, and the Attorneys-General for Nova Scotia and Quebec obtained special leave to appeal against so much of the judgment as answered the questions adversely to their submissions and contentions.

May 26, 1898. LORD HERSCHELL.—The Governor-General of Canada by Order in Council referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing and consideration various questions relating to the property, rights and legislative jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada and the provinces respectively in relation to rivers, lakes, harbours, fisheries, and other cognate subjects. The Supreme Court having answered some of the questions submitted adversely to the Dominion and some adversely to the provinces, both parties have appealed.

Before approaching the particular questions submitted, their Lordships think it well to advert to certain general considerations which must be steadily kept in view and appear to have been lost sight of in some of the arguments presented to their Lordships. It is unnecessary to determine to what extent the rivers and lakes of Canada are vested in the Crown or what public rights exist in respect of them. Whether a lake or river be vested in the Crown as represented by the Dominion or as represented by the province in which it is situate, it is equally Crown property, and the rights of the public in respect of it except in so far as they may be modified by legislation, are precisely the same. The answer, therefore, to such questions as those adverted to would not assist in determining whether in any particular case the property is vested in the Dominion or in the province. It must also be borne in mind that there is a broad distinction between proprietary rights and legislative jurisdiction. The fact that such jurisdiction in respect of a particular subject matter is conferred on the Dominion legislature for example affords no evidence that any proprietary rights with respect to it were transferred to the Dominion. There is no presumption that, because legislative jurisdiction was vested in the Dominion Parliament, proprietary rights were transferred to it. The Dominion of Canada was called into existence by the British North America Act, 1867. Whatever proprietary rights were at the time of the passing of that Act possessed by the provinces remain vested in them, except such as are by any of its express enactments transferred to the Dominion of Canada.

With these preliminary observations their Lordships proceed to consider the questions submitted to them. The first of these is, whether the beds of all lakes, rivers, public harbours, and other waters, or any and which of them situate within the territorial limits of the several provinces and not granted before confederation, became under the British North American Act the property of the Dominion. It is necessary to deal with the several subject-matters referred to separately, though the answer as to each of them depends mainly on the construction of the Third Schedule to the British North America Act. By s. 108 of that Act it is provided

A that the public works and property of each province enumerated in the schedule shall be the property of Canada. That schedule is headed, "Provincial public works and property to be the property of Canada," and contains an enumeration of various subjects numbered 1 to 10. The fifth of these is "rivers and lake improvements." The word "rivers" obviously applies to nothing which was not vested in the province. It is contended on behalf of the Dominion that, under the words quoted, the whole of the rivers so vested were transferred from the province to the Dominion. It is contended on the other hand that nothing more was transferred than the improvements of the provincial rivers, that is to say, only public works which had been effected and not the entire beds of the rivers. If the words used had been "river and lake improvements," or if the word "lake" had been in the plural "lakes," there could have been no doubt that the improvements only were transferred. Cogent arguments were adduced in support of each of the rival constructions.

Upon the whole their Lordships, after careful consideration, have arrived at the conclusion that the court below was right, and that the improvements only were transferred to the Dominion. There can be no doubt that the subjects comprised in the schedule are for the most part works or constructions which have resulted from the expenditure of public money, though there are exceptions. It is to be observed that rivers and lake improvements are coupled together as one item. If the intention had been to transfer the entire bed of the rivers and only artificial works on lakes, one would not have expected to find them thus coupled together. Lake improvements might in that case more naturally have been found as a separate item or been coupled with canals. Moreover, it is impossible not to be impressed by the inconvenience which would arise if the entire rivers were transferred, and only the improvements of lakes. How would it be possible in that case to define the limits of the Dominion and provincial rights respectively? Rivers flow into and out of lakes; it would often be difficult to determine where the river ended and the lake began. Reasons were adduced why the rivers should have been vested in the Dominion, but every one of these reasons seems equally applicable to lakes. The construction of the words as applicable to the improvements of rivers only is not an impossible one. It does no violence to the language employed. Their Lordships feel justified, therefore, in putting upon the language used the construction which seems to them to be more probably in accordance with the intention of the legislature.

With regard to public harbours, their Lordships entertain no doubt that, whatever is properly comprised in this term, became vested in the Dominion of Canada. The words of the enactment in the third schedule are precise. It was contended on behalf of the provinces that only those parts of what might ordinarily fall within the term "harbour," on which public works had been executed became vested in the Dominion, and that no part of the bed of the sea did so. Their Lordships are unable to adopt this view. The Supreme Court in arriving at the same conclusion founded their opinion on a previous decision in the same court in Holman v. Green (1), where it was held that the foreshore between high and low watermark on the margin of the harbour became the property of the Dominion as part of the harbour. Their Lordships think it extremely inconvenient that a determination should be sought of the abstract question, what falls within the description "public harbour." They must decline to attempt an exhaustive definition of the term applicable to all cases. To do so would in their judgment be likely to prove misleading and dangerous. It must depend, to some extent at all events, upon the circumstances of each particular harbour, what forms a part of that harbour. It is only possible to deal with definite issues which have been raised. It appears to have been thought by the Supreme Court in Holman v. Green (1) that if more than the public works connected with the harbour passed under that word, and if it included any part of the bed of the sea, it followed that the foreshore between the high and low watermark being also Crown property, likewise passed to the Dominion. Their Lordships are of opinion that it does not follow that because the foreshore on the margin of a harbour is Crown property it necessarily forms part of the harbour. It may or may not do so, according to circumstances. If for example it had actually been used for harbour purposes such as anchoring ships or landing goods, it would no doubt form part of the harbour, but there are other cases in which, in their Lordships' opinion, it would be equally clear that it did not form part of it. A

Their Lordships pass now to the questions relating to fisheries and fishing rights. Their Lordships are of opinion that s. 91 of the British North America Act did not convey to the Dominion of Canada any proprietary rights in relation to fisheries. Their Lordships have already noticed the distinction which must be borne in mind between rights of property and legislative jurisdiction. It was the latter only which was conferred under the heading "Sea-coast and inland fisheries" in s. 91. Whatever proprietary rights in relation to fisheries were previously vested in private individuals or in the provinces respectively remained untouched by that enactment. Whatever grants might previously have been lawfully made by the provinces in virtue of their proprietary rights could lawfully be made after that enactment came into force. At the same time it must be remembered that the power to legislate in relation to fisheries does necessarily to a certain extent enable the legislature so empowered to affect proprietary rights. An enactment, for example, prescribing the times of the year during which fishing is to be allowed, or the instruments which may be employed for the purpose (which it was admitted the Dominion legislature was empowered to pass) might very seriously touch the exercise of proprietary rights, and the extent, character, and scope of such legislation is left entirely to the Dominion legislature. The suggestion that the power might be abused so as to amount to a practical confiscation of property does not warrant the imposition by the courts of any limit upon the absolute power of legislation conferred. The supreme legislative power in relation to any subject-matter is always capable of abuse, but it is not to be assumed that it will be improperly used; if it is, the only remedy is an appeal to those by whom the legislature is elected. If, however, the legislature purports to confer upon others proprietary rights, where it possesses none itself, that, in their Lordships' opinion, is not an exercise of the legislative jurisdiction conferred by s. 91. If the contrary were held, it would follow that the dominion might practically transfer to itself property which has by the British North America Act been left to the provinces and not vested in it. B C D E F

In addition, however, to the legislative power conferred by the twelfth item of s. 91, the fourth item of that section confers upon the Parliament of Canada the power of raising money by any mode or system of taxation. Their Lordships think it is impossible to exclude as not within this power the provision imposing a tax by way of licence as a condition of the right to fish. It is true that by virtue of s. 92 the provincial legislature may impose the obligation to obtain a licence, in order to raise a revenue for provincial purposes, but this cannot, in their Lordships' opinion, derogate from the taxing power of the Dominion Parliament to which they have already called attention. Their Lordships are quite sensible of the possible inconveniences, to which attention was called in the course of the arguments, which might arise from the exercise of the right of imposing taxation in respect of the same subject-matter and within the same area by different authorities. They have no doubt, however, that these would be obviated in practice by the good sense of the legislatures concerned. It follows from what has been said that in so far as s. 4 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 95, empowers the grant of fishery leases conferring an exclusive right to fish in property belonging not to the Dominion but to the provinces it was not within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament to pass it. This was the only section of the Act which was impeached in the course of the argument, but the subsidiary provisions, in so far as they are intended to enforce a right which it was not competent for the Dominion to confer, would of course fall with the principal enactment. G H I

Their Lordships think that the legislature of Ontario had jurisdiction to enact s. 47 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, c. 24, except in so far as it relates to land

A in the harbours and canals, if any of the latter be included in the words "other navigable waters of Ontario." The reasons for this opinion have been already stated when dealing with the questions in whom the beds of harbours, rivers, and lakes were vested.

B The sections of the Ontario Act of 1892, entitled "An Act for the protection of the provincial fisheries," which are in question consist almost exclusively of provisions, relating to the manner of fishing in provincial waters. Regulations controlling the manner of fishing are undoubtedly within the competence of the Dominion Parliament. The question is whether they can be the subject of provincial legislation in so far as it is not inconsistent with the Dominion legislation. By s. 91 of the British North America Act, the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada is empowered to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by that Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces "and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section" it is declared that (notwithstanding anything in the Act) "the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next thereafter enumerated." The twelfth of them is "Sea-coast and inland fisheries." The earlier part of this section read in connection with the words beginning "and for greater certainty" appears to amount to a legislative declaration that any legislation falling strictly within any of the classes specially enumerated in s. 91 is not within the legislative competence of the provincial legislatures under s. 92. In any view the enactment is express that laws in relation to matters falling within any of the classes enumerated in s. 91 are within the "exclusive" legislative authority of the Dominion Parliament. Whenever, therefore, a matter is within one of these specified classes, legislation in relation to it by a provincial legislature is, in their Lordships' opinion, incompetent.

E It has been suggested, and this view has been adopted by some of the judges of the Supreme Court, that although the Dominion legislation dealing with the subject would override provincial legislation, the latter is nevertheless valid unless and until the Dominion Parliament so legislates. Their Lordships think that such a view does not give their due effect to the terms of s. 91 and in particular to the word "exclusively." It would authorise for example the enactment of a bankruptcy law or a copyright law in any of the provinces unless and until the Dominion Parliament passed enactments dealing with those subjects. Their Lordships do not think that this is consistent with the language and manifest intention of the British North America Act. It is true that this Board held, in A.-G. of Ontario v. A.-G. for Dominion of Canada (2), that a law passed by a provincial legislature which affected the assignments and property of insolvent persons was valid as falling within the heading "Property and civil rights" although it was of such a nature that it would be a suitable ancillary provision to a bankruptcy law. But the ground of this decision was that the law in question did not fall within the class "Bankruptcy and insolvency" in the sense in which those words were used in s. 91. For these reasons their Lordships feel constrained to hold that the enactment of fishery regulations and restrictions is within the exclusive competence of the Dominion legislature, and is not within the legislative powers of provincial legislatures.

H But while, in their Lordships' opinion all restrictions or limitations by which public rights of fishing are sought to be limited or controlled can be the subject of dominion legislation only, it does not follow that the legislation of provincial legislatures is incompetent merely because it may have relations to fisheries. For example, provisions prescribing the mode in which a private fishery is to be conveyed or otherwise disposed of, and the right of succession in respect of it would be properly treated as falling under the heading "Property and civil rights" within s. 92, and not as in the class "Fisheries" within the meaning of s. 91. So, too, the terms and conditions upon which the fisheries which are the property of the province may be granted, leased, or otherwise disposed of and the rights which consistently with any general regulations respecting fisheries enacted by the Dominion Parliament may be conferred therein appear proper subjects for provincial legislation, either under class 5 of s. 92, "The management and sale of public lands," or under the class "Property and civil rights." Such legislation deals directly with property, its disposal and the rights to be enjoyed in respect of it, and was not in their Lordships' opinion intended to be within the scope of the class "Fisheries" as that word is used in s. 91. The various provisions of the Ontario Act of 1892 were not minutely discussed before their Lordships, nor have they the information before them which would enable them to give a definite and certain answer as to every one of the sections in question. The views, however, which they have expressed, and the dividing line they have indicated, will, they apprehend, afford the means of determining upon the validity of any particular provision or the limits within which its operation may be upheld, for it is to be observed that s. 1 of the Act limits its operation to "fishing in waters and to waters over or in respect of which the legislature of this province has authority to legislate for the purposes of this Act." Sections 1375, 1376, and s. 1377 (1) of the Revised Statutes of Quebec (51 & 52 Vict., c. 17) afford good illustrations of legislation such as their Lordships regard as within the functions of a provincial legislature. Their Lordships entertain no doubt that the Dominion Parliament had jurisdiction to pass the Act intituled "An Act respecting certain works constructed in or over navigable waters" (Revised Statutes of Canada, c. 92 (1886)). It is, in their opinion, clearly legislation relating to "navigation."

Their Lordships must decline to answer the last question submitted as to the rights of riparian proprietors. These proprietors are not parties to this litigation or represented before their Lordships, and accordingly their Lordships do not think it proper when determining the respective rights and jurisdictions of the Dominion and provincial legislatures to express an opinion upon the extent of the rights possessed by riparian proprietors. The parties will, of course, bear their own costs of these proceedings.

A debtor, having been made bankrupt on his own petition, made a private arrangement with his creditors by which they were to receive a cash payment of ten shillings in the pound, in consideration of which they would release the debtor from his debts and withdraw their proofs in his bankruptcy. The official receiver, considering that the proposed arrangement was a proper one, did not oppose an application by the debtor to the registrar for rescission of the receiving order, and did not ask for a public examination of the debtor. The registrar having rescinded the order,

Appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar HOPE rescinding a receiving order.

The debtor carried on business as a hosier in the City of London, and, finding himself in financial difficulties in the summer of 1897, he presented a bankruptcy petition against himself on July 22 of that year. On the same day a receiving order was made founded on the petition. On July 31 he filed a statement of his affairs, and his preliminary examination then took place. He then entered into negotiations with his creditors for the private settlement of his affairs, with the result that a committee of three of his principal creditors was appointed to inquire into and make a report as to what had best be done in the interests of the creditors. The report of this committee was to the effect that, on the whole, it would be more advantageous to the creditors to receive an immediate cash payment of ten shillings in the pound than that the debtor's estate should be administered in bankruptcy. In October, therefore, an arrangement was completed under which the father of the debtor paid to all the creditors ten shillings in the pound in respect of their claims against the debtor, and the creditors by deed released the debtor from their claims, and withdrew their proofs in the bankruptcy. Previously to this an order had been made by the registrar, with the consent of the official receiver, that all proceedings in the bankruptcy should be stayed until Oct. 26 for the debtor to make such application as he might be advised, upon an undertaking being given by the debtor to keep an account of the business and pay over to the official receiver all moneys received, less current expenses, and an amount to be fixed by the official receiver for the maintenance of the debtor. This order was subsequently extended to Nov. 5. On the same day, upon the application of the debtor, which was in no way opposed by the official receiver, the registrar made an order rescinding the receiving order. Against this order the official receiver, on the instructions of the Board of Trade, appealed.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provided :

"Section 104 (1). Every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under this Act may review, rescind, or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction."

The Bankruptcy Act, 1890, provided :

"Section 3.—(1.) Where a debtor intends to make a proposal for a composition in satisfaction of his debts or a proposal for a scheme of arrangement of his affairs, he shall within four days of submitting his statement of affairs, or within such time thereafter as the official receiver may fix, lodge with the official receiver a proposal in writing signed by him embodying the terms of the composition or scheme which he is desirous of submitting for the consideration of his creditors, and setting out particulars of any sureties or securities proposed. (2.) In such case the official receiver shall hold a meeting of creditors before the public examination of the debtor is concluded, and send to each creditor before the meeting a copy of the debtor's proposal with a report thereon; and if at that meeting a majority in number and three-fourths in value of all the creditors who have proved resolve to accept the proposal, the same shall be deemed to be duly accepted by the creditors, and when approved by the court shall be binding on all the creditors. . . . (5.) The debtor or the official receiver may, after the proposal is accepted by the creditors, apply to the court to approve it, and notice of the time appointed for hearing the application shall be given to each creditor who has proved. (6.) The application shall not be heard until after the conclusion of the public examination of the debtor. . . ."

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Carrington for the debtor.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I think that the decision of the learned registrar should be affirmed. Two questions have been raised in this case. The first is whether the registrar had jurisdiction to make the order appealed against, and the second is whether, assuming that he had jurisdiction, he has exercised his discretion rightly or wrongly in the matter. The facts we have to deal with are few, but I look upon the case as one of a very special nature.

The debtor carried on business as a hosier in the city of London, and in July one of

A his creditors put in an execution. Thereupon on July 22 the debtor filed a petition in bankruptcy against himself, and upon the same day a receiving order was made on the petition. The next thing was that he induced his father to make an arrangement with the creditors under which they were all paid 10s. in the pound. The official receiver, an officer of the court, standing between a debtor and his creditors, whose duty it is to investigate the affairs of a debtor, knew that there had been no delinquency under the Bankruptcy Acts on the part of the debtor, and he also knew exactly what was the position of his affairs, and that the creditors would certainly not get more than 10s. in the pound if the bankruptcy proceedings were continued. The official receiver therefore, considering that the proposed arrangement was a very proper one under the circumstances of the case, did not oppose the application made to the registrar, and did not ask for any public examination of the debtor.

C This is the fact which I wish to emphasise as it distinguishes the case from the generality of the cases which come before the court. The official receiver, knowing all about the affairs of the debtor and having nothing to say in any shape or way against him, was content that the receiving order should be rescinded without any public examination of the debtor, but now the Board of Trade, whose officer the official receiver is, appeals to this court and contends that the debtor ought to be publicly examined before the receiving order is rescinded.

D It is true that the first contention put before us was that the registrar had no jurisdiction to rescind until after the debtor's public examination, but, as the first case cited shewed that rescission was entirely a matter for the discretion of the court, it was then contended that the registrar had exercised his discretion wrongly.

E I own that when I first read s. 3 (6) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, I thought it was a direct legislative enactment that an application to the court to approve a proposal for a composition after it had been agreed to by the creditors, should not be heard until after the conclusion of the public examination of the debtor. That seemed like a direct enactment that the court could not approve of a scheme for composition and rescind a receiving order, until after the debtor had been publicly examined.

F But then it was pointed out that by s. 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy may "review, rescind, or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction." On behalf of the debtor it was contended that, under those general words the registrar had jurisdiction in the present case to rescind the receiving order that had been made, and that it was entirely a matter for his discretion whether or not the order should be rescinded. Taking the cases that have been decided since the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, down to the present time,

G two of which have been decided since the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, I find nowhere any expression of a doubt, that in a case like this the court has a discretion to exercise whether or not the receiving order shall be rescinded. I agree with the contention put forward on behalf of the debtor that though the words of s. 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, [which replaced s. 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883] are not identical with the words of s. 18 of the 1883 Act, nevertheless the effect is the same so far as the present case is concerned.

H In the face of the authorities I could not throw any doubt upon the subject, and I am therefore of opinion that the registrar had jurisdiction at his discretion to rescind this receiving order.

Then comes the question whether or not he has exercised that discretion rightly. It has been contended that his discretion was wrongly exercised on the ground that, according to the authorities, there are only two kinds of cases in which such an order as this could be made, viz., cases in which the debtor has paid twenty shillings in the pound and cases in which it is clear that the receiving order ought never to have been made. I do not find any such hard and fast rule as that laid down by the authorities. It is true that some judges, and especially CAVE, J., in Re Leslie, Ex parte Leslie (1) and Re Hester, Ex parte Hester (2), do seem to have thought that such was the rule, but that was not the opinion of the Court of Appeal in Re Hester, Ex parte Hester (2). In that case LORD ESHER, M.R., referring to Re Dixon and Cardus (3), used these words (22 Q.B.D. at p. 638):

"But I think that, in that case, the court also said that if the proposed arrangement is equivalent to a scheme under s. 18, and the court can see that it may with perfect safety be sanctioned, they would not decide that such a proposition must be at once rejected, merely because the formalities imposed by s. 18 have not been complied with."

Fry, L.J., in the same case, said this (ibid. at pp. 641, 642):

"In my judgment in Re Dixon and Cardus (3), I agreed with the Master of the Rolls that we should not lay down that no arrangement with creditors could have effect given to it, unless it proceeded under s. 18. I will not say that now."

It seems to me that those two learned judges not only decided that the registrar has a discretion to rescind a receiving order, but, further, they refused to say that the discretion could only be exercised in cases where the debtor has paid twenty shillings in the pound or in cases in which no receiving order ought to have been made. But, of course, as has been remarked by many judges, it is very necessary for the court to keep an eagle eye on transactions by way of compositions with creditors, because it is one of the duties of the court to protect creditors against themselves.

The next case I wish to refer to is Re Flatau, Ex parte Official Receiver (4). The judgment of LORD ESHER, M.R., shows clearly that the rescission of a receiving order is a matter in which the registrar must exercise his discretion, but he goes on to point out that the assent of the petitioning creditor is not of itself a fact upon which alone the registrar could act. He says ([1893] Q.B. at pp. 221, 222) that the debtor "went before the registrar with an application to rescind the receiving order which, as it then stood, was a good and valid order. He did not produce any affidavit, but he satisfied the registrar that he had the consent of the petitioning creditor; and I think the appeal must be decided on the assumption that that fact was proved to the registrar, but that fact alone. He had the consent of the petitioning creditor; he had paid him and satisfied him. But there were, or might be, other creditors and they were not there and the circumstances were not known to the registrar. Could the registrar properly on that, and that alone, rescind the receiving order without entering upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the debtor's insolvency—how it came about; what had been the conduct of the debtor when he incurred the debts; what had been his conduct after the debts were incurred; and what was the position of things at the time? All these were things which ought to be considered, if we are of opinion that the order could not be rescinded merely upon the consent of the petitioning creditor."

That seems to me to show that, in deciding whether he ought to rescind the receiving order, many matters should be taken into consideration by the registrar besides the two classes of things suggested. In my judgment it shows that the registrar had a discretion in the present case to rescind the receiving order. The official receiver might have informed him if any offence against the bankruptcy laws was suggested against the debtor, or if anything was to be said against the debtor as to the way in which he had kept his books or carried on his business, and I think that the registrar has taken all this into consideration.

The only other case I will refer to is Re Davidson (5). There the Court of Appeal affirmed a refusal of the registrar to rescind a receiving order, saying that he had a discretion and must take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, and when he had exercised his discretion it would require a very strong case to authorise or to induce the Court of Appeal to interfere. Those words seem to me to be applicable to the present case, although that was a case in which the registrar refused to rescind, whereas in the present case the registrar has held

A that the receiving order ought to be rescinded. The present case is one of a very special nature, but the registrar had jurisdiction to make the order appealed against, and he made it after having had all the circumstances of the case brought before him, and after having come to the conclusion that there was nothing in the case which required further investigation. For these reasons I cannot say that the registrar has exercised his discretion wrongly, and therefore I think that the
B appeal should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I feel it my duty to dissent from the judgment that has been delivered and to do so on several grounds. I do not question for a moment the authority and discretion of the court under the Bankruptcy Acts to rescind a receiving order under certain conditions, but I think that the present case is not
C one in which a rescission should have been ordered. It is well known that one of the grave evils of the past which were intended to be remedied by the recent bankruptcy laws was that arising from settlements with creditors by private arrangement. I think that this has been effectually guarded against, but it seems to me that, if the court is to have a general discretion to exercise as regards the rescinding of receiving orders, the result will be such as to detract materially from D the beneficial effect of recent legislation.

I, therefore, do not quite agree in the view that has been taken by A. L. SMITH, L.J. Undoubtedly the provisions of s. 3 (6) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, are very much on the same lines as those of s. 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. That section did not in terms provide that no scheme of arrangement with creditors should be submitted to the approval of the court until after the public examination of the debtor had been concluded. Several cases, of which Re Hester (2) is the leading one, were decided upon s. 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. But all those cases I read as simply decisions upon the question whether or not there was a scheme of arrangement within the meaning of that section. I think that the judges in those cases expressly refused to decide whether or not the court had a discretion to rescind the receiving order. Certain sentences may no doubt be picked
E out of the judgments here and there, which lead towards a different conclusion. But all those cases were cases in which the court affirmed a refusal by the registrar to rescind the receiving order. The judges may have expressed opinions, but they should not be held to have been deciding a point which was not before them. I do not think that they intended to lay down that the court has a discretion to F rescind a receiving order. It seems to me that that question was carefully left open.

Then came the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 3, which repealed and replaced s. 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. I think we ought to give effect to the change which was then introduced. One of the most important of the provisions of this section seems to me to be that of sub-s. (6), that no application can be made to the court
H to approve a scheme of arrangement with creditors until after the public examination of the debtor. Possibly that is not exactly the effect of the words, but I think that is what was intended. There must have been some motive for the alteration in the law. The variation in language between the two Acts cannot have been merely capricious. The motive for making this change seems to me to be most probably this: A doubt had arisen, under the Act of 1883, whether or not, in view
I of a scheme of arrangement with creditors, the court had a discretion to rescind a receiving order. In order to put an end to that doubt, and not to overrule any decided case, s. 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, was passed. I agree that the language of the section does not absolutely cover the case of an application to rescind; it only deals with an application to the court to approve a scheme of arrangement, but that application cannot be heard by the court until after the conclusion of the public examination of the debtor.

Considering the cases decided before 1890, I shrink from saying that the court has absolutely no jurisdiction to entertain an application to rescind a receiving order in view of a scheme of arrangement made by the debtor with his creditors; but it seems clear to me, though I say it with diffidence out of respect to the opinions of A. L. SMITH, L.J., and HENN COLLINS, L.J., that it was never intended that the main ground, or, as it seems to be in this case, the only ground, of an application for the rescission of the receiving order should be the fact that the debtor has privately come to an arrangement with his creditors, since it was one of the principal objects of the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 and 1890, to render such arrangements impossible after a receiving order has been made.

That being so, I come to the question, What is there special about this case? So far from there being anything special about it, it seems to me to be a kind of case which will tend to become very general. A young man in trade voluntarily presents a bankruptcy petition against himself. It may or may not be that he at one time intended that his estate should be administered under the bankruptcy laws; but, in point of fact, the filing of the petition has given him the advantage of a respite from the pressing claims of his creditors, and has enabled him to prosecute to a successful conclusion his negotiations for a private arrangement with his creditors under which his father agreed to pay them, and has paid them, not the whole amount of their debts but a composition of ten shillings in the pound. Thus the debtor has taken advantage of the bankruptcy proceedings which he instituted against himself to obtain a private settlement of his affairs. So far from this being in accordance with the law, it seems to me to be entirely contrary to the spirit and meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts. Therefore, if the registrar had any discretion to exercise as regards the application made to him which is a matter upon which I feel considerable doubt, but will give no decided opinion, I cannot conceive that he has exercised it rightly in the present case, and therefore it seems to me that we ought to reverse his decision. The only basis upon which the application to the registrar was founded was the private arrangement which the debtor had made with his creditors, and it seems to me that it would be an entire departure from the provisions of the Act to make a private arrangement like this a ground for an application for the rescission of a receiving order.

I think that there is a great deal to be said for the opinion that has been expressed by some judges that the grounds upon which an application to rescind a receiving order can be made should be similar to those upon which the court has power to annul an adjudication. Section 35 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see now s. 29 (1) of the 1914 Act] provides that “where, in the opinion of the court, a debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt, or where it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full, the court may, on the application of any person interested, by order annul the adjudication.”

There are the two grounds upon which an adjudication may be annulled, and I cannot see any difference in the principles on which the court should act in annulling an adjudication and in rescinding a receiving order. One is a step further than the other, but it is a step which would naturally be taken after the other. In my opinion the court ought to look at s. 35 (1) when an application is made to rescind a receiving order. It is perfectly clear that neither of the two grounds on which an adjudication may be annulled exist in the present case. The debtor here has not been adjudicated bankrupt, but I see no reason why the court in dealing with his application to rescind the receiving order made against him should not follow the analogy of s. 35 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The debtor has brought himself within the scope of the bankruptcy law, and I do not think he ought to be allowed to escape from the position in which he has placed himself on the ground of his having made a private arrangement with his creditors unless the scheme of arrangement had all the safeguards which the legislature thought necessary.

In the present case I do not think that the official receiver assented to the order

A which the debtor asked for, but even if he had I do not think that his assent would be any reason preventing or relieving the court from deciding the case now. What did happen was this: The official receiver consented to the postponement of the proceedings under the receiving order upon certain terms. It was said that these terms showed the reliance placed by the official receiver upon the debtor, but I cannot see much in that point. The terms which the official receiver required were

B that the debtor should pay into court all moneys received by him in his business beyond necessary expenses, and such allowance as might be made to him for maintenance. Those seem to me to be very reasonable terms to require in a case where the official receiver knows nothing against the debtor, but I cannot agree that they show that the official receiver has approved of the conduct of the debtor, or has represented to the registrar that the debtor's conduct has been in all respects

C regular. I think it would be very wrong on the part of the official receiver to make any such statement to the registrar without having previously exhausted all the means provided by the Bankruptcy Act for ascertaining whether or not a debtor's conduct has been regular. But in the present case the official receiver made no such statement. The utmost that can be said is that he did not oppose the making of the order. But he did not consent to it, and could have applied the very

D next day to have it set aside.

But it is said that the appellant here is really the Board of Trade, and not the official receiver. The official receiver holds a double office. He is to a certain extent the officer of the court, but he is also bound to act under the directions of the Board of Trade. If the Board of Trade thought the case so important in principle that an appeal ought to be brought against the decision of the registrar they were

E right in causing the appeal to be brought. I see nothing special in this case. It seems to me an ordinary case in which a debtor has invoked the assistance of the bankruptcy law, and has taken advantage of a receiving order being made against him to obtain an arrangement from his creditors under which they are not to be paid in full. Having then made this private arrangement in a way which the Bankruptcy Acts clearly meant to discourage, if not to forbid altogether, he

F comes to the court and makes it the ground for an application that the receiving order should be rescinded. On all these grounds I think that the appeal ought to be allowed, but as my learned brethren are of a contrary opinion it will be dismissed.

G HENN COLLINS, L.J.—I agree with the judgment of A. L. SMITH, L.J., but as there is a difference of opinion upon the Bench I will add a few words. The first, and the chief, point seems to me to be whether the registrar has jurisdiction to rescind the receiving order. It was contended that, by virtue of the provisions of s. 3 (6) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, he had no jurisdiction to do so until after the debtor had been publicly examined. But on examination of that sub-

H section, it appears to me that it only relates to the proposal for the scheme referred to in the preceding sub-sections. The application there referred to is an application for the approval of the scheme proposed by the debtor. The question therefore is whether a proposal of the scheme by the debtor and its approval by the court are a condition precedent to the power of the registrar to rescind the receiving order. That question seems to me to be decided by authority. Section

I 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, gives a general authority to the court to review, rescind, or vary any order made by it. Is the power to exercise the discretion given by that section subject to the suggested condition precedent? The head-note in the LAW REPORTS to Re Hester, Ex parte Hester (2) which was decided in 1889 is as follows (22 Q.B.D. at p. 632):

"The court has jurisdiction to rescind a receiving order, even though no scheme of arrangement or composition has been proposed by the debtor under the provisions of s. 18 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883."

That was obviously the opinion, if not the decision, of the judges in that case.

But then it was suggested that there is a difference on this point between the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. In my opinion they are exactly the same on this point. Under both of them the conclusion of the debtor's public examination is a condition precedent to an application for the approval of the proposed scheme of arrangement. Under the earlier Act two meetings of the creditors were held, and the public examination of the debtor took place between them. The scheme could not be approved by the creditors until the second meeting, and therefore, a fortiori, no application to the court could be based upon it, until after the debtor's public examination had taken place. The Act of 1890 substituted one meeting in the place of the two meetings held under the earlier Act, and it also made the public examination a condition precedent to the application for the approval of the court. Therefore I think that the cases decided upon the Act of 1883 that have been referred to, which decided that the court has a discretion in this matter notwithstanding no public examination has taken place, are still good authorities.

But the matter does not rest there. Since the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, two further cases have been decided. The head-note in the LAW REPORTS of Re Flatau, Ex parte Official Receiver (4) is as follows ([1893] 2 Q.B. at p. 219):

“When a receiving order has been made the court will not, even though the proceedings under it have been stayed, rescind the order merely upon the consent of the petitioning creditor. The court has a discretion in the matter, and will not rescind the order without a full investigation of all the circumstances, including the conduct of the debtor.”

There was no scheme in that case, and therefore no approval. That decision was followed in Re Davidson (5). There also there was no scheme. The court said that the registrar had a discretion and ought to take into consideration all the circumstances of the case. It therefore seems to me that it is now clear that the learned registrar had to exercise his discretion in dealing with the application made by the debtor in the present case. It was then contended that the discretion was wrongly exercised. But in the case just cited I find that the court said that when the registrar had exercised his discretion it would require a very strong case to authorise or to induce the Court of Appeal to interfere. The registrar after full examination of the facts before him thought that he was justified in rescinding the receiving order. I quite agree that it is essential that the closest possible vigilance should be exercised over the debtor and his affairs, and also over the creditors themselves, in the interests of the public. It has been done in the present case. The preliminary examination has taken place, and everything was carried on from July to November under the direct superintendence of the official receiver. He, with every means of information, has been an assenting party throughout these proceedings. Therefore in dismissing this appeal we are safeguarded by what has been done by the officer of the court whose function it is to watch over these things, and by the great experience of the learned registrar who rescinded the receiving order in this very exceptional case. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

July 27, 1897. The following opinions were read.

H

I

So far, I do not differ, if these words point to the station committee of the railway company itself being set right by the appropriate tribunal. But I am of opinion that the station is absolutely the property of the railway company, and that the rights of the railway company are just as absolute, in the first instance, as those of any other proprietor. That by appeal to the appropriate tribunal they may be compelled to permit passengers and traffic into the station under a variety of conditions or under a proper order of the court, is true; but that against their will any member of the public has a right to force himself on the platform or into the booking-office I cannot agree. The public has a right to enter for the purpose of making a contract with them, and the railway company may be compelled to grant proper facilities for such purpose, if they refuse to do so, either by action at suit of the complaining party or by an application to the Railway Commissioners. But I should be sorry to throw any doubt on the absolute right of the railway company in the first instance to regulate their own traffic in their own way, and to refuse access to their station under the circumstances stated in this case. Of course, it would be represented as a ludicrous exercise of authority to prescribe the dress in which persons may approach this station, but I can quite understand the inconvenience which might result to the passengers—that is to the public—if, apart from the annoyance of actual solicitation of custom for various hotels outside, the persons who rush in to solicit custom should do it by conspicuous badges describing the hotel to which they belong. I do not believe that any actual inconvenience to the public can result from the recognition of the right of the railway company to carry on their business in their own way. Their own interests are the best security that their strict legal right will not be abused.

I think that there would be some difficulty in framing an interdict in the language originally asked, but the order which your Lordships have agreed to is such that I think no inconvenience will arise; and I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be reversed, and the order which your Lordships have agreed on, which is as follows, substituted :

“That the interlocutor of the Second Division appealed from, except in so far as it recalls the interlocutors of the sheriff-substitute and the sheriff of the county of Perth, be reversed, and that the respondent Alexander Ross do pay appellants their costs of this appeal; that it be declared that, subject to the terms of any order or regulations which may be hereafter made by the Railway Commissioners, the respondent Alexander Ross, as tenant of the Royal British Hotel, Leonard Street, Perth, has no right by himself or his servants to enter upon or use the Perth General Railway Station except with the leave of the appellants; and under such conditions as they may prescribe; that in respect of the preceding declaration it is unnecessary to dispose of the conclusions of the present action for interdict; that the case be remitted to the Second Division of the Court of Session, with directions to dismiss the appellants’ petition, and to find the respondent liable to the appellants in the expenses of the process incurred by them both in the Court of Session and in the sheriff court.”

LORD WATSON.—This appeal is from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session which recalls, and in substance re-affirms, two interlocutors pronounced in the sheriff court of Perthshire by the sheriff-substitute and the sheriff. Your Lordships are, therefore, bound to treat the findings of fact contained in the interlocutors as having the force and effect of the special verdict of a jury. The effect of the findings cannot, in the present case, be fully appreciated without referring to the circumstances which gave rise to the litigation, which appear on the face of the record and are not in dispute.

The respondent, Alexander Ross, is an hotel-keeper, being tenant of the Royal British Hotel, Leonard Street, Perth, in the vicinity of the General Railway Station, the property and management of which is vested by statute in the appellants for behoof of the companies who use the station for the purposes of their traffic. Until the date of this action, the appellants, who have an hotel of their own within the limits of the station, permitted all the hotel-keepers in Perth, including the respondent, to have free access to the platforms, by themselves and their servants, for the purpose of accompanying their guests to the train by which they were departing, and of meeting them on their arrival. But that privilege was qualified by the condition that no servant should on these occasions wear a distinctive badge or livery. The respondent was dissatisfied with the condition, of which, admittedly,

A he had notice and, on July 1, 1895, he intimated by letter to the appellants' station-master that "I am resolved to send my 'boots' to Perth General Station, wearing the badge and uniform of my hotel, where my customers may be attended to on arrival here as they are at other railway and steamboat stations over the country."

B That intimation was followed up by the respondent sending his "boots" with badge and uniform, to the passenger platforms on numerous occasions during the month of July, 1895, and on all these occasions he refused to leave the station when requested to do so by the officials of the appellants.

C On July 26, 1895, the appellants presented a petition to the sheriff court of Perthshire, at Perth, craving to have the respondent, by himself or by his "boots" or other servants, interdicted, first, from unlawfully entering or trespassing on any part of the railway station or other works or premises of the appellants; secondly, in particular from so entering or trespassing in or on the Perth General Railway Station or other works or premises therewith connected, while wearing the uniform or badge of the respondent or of the Royal British Hotel; and, thirdly, from waiting the arrival of passenger trains therein for the purpose of obtaining customers for said hotel. The respondent in his defence denied that he or his servants had committed any trespass, and alleged that the object of the appellants in preventing hotel servants from coming to their platforms with badges or in uniform was to give a preference to their own station hotel, to his prejudice. His fifth plea in law is to the effect that "the object of the petition being an attempt to restrict the liberty of the defender, Ross, or his servants, in the matter of wearing a uniform or badge, is illegal, and the pursuers are not entitled to interdict."

E A long proof was led before the sheriff-substitute, who, on Feb. 13, 1896, issued an interlocutor containing various findings of fact and law, by which he refused the prayer of the petition. The basis of the decision is indicated in one of the learned judge's findings in point of law, which is to the effect that the appellants

F "as proprietors of said station, hold their said property under the condition of their not preventing its convenient use by any member of the railway travelling public, or with the presence therein of the keeper and servants of the hotel where such traveller has been staying, or which he may propose to go to, except in so far as is necessary for the proper management and control of the station, and for the securing of which the pursuers have power to make such regulations or bye-laws as they may think necessary."

G The learned judge appears to have been of opinion that, it not having been proved to his satisfaction that the presence of the respondent in the station by himself or his servants interfered with the proper control and management thereof, their exclusion would constitute an illegal interference with the convenience of the members of the railway travelling public. The sheriff, on April 17, 1896, affirmed the judgment of his substitute, apparently in deference to these or similar considerations. On appeal to the Court of Session, the Second Division of the court on June 25, 1896, by the judgment submitted to review, recalled the interlocutors of the sheriff and his substitute, and found in fact:

H "First, that the defender did not by himself or his servants enter the pursuers' station except for the purpose of accompanying passengers who were leaving his hotel, or of meeting passengers who had intimated that they were to arrive at the defenders' hotel; and, secondly, that neither the defender nor his servants ever caused any obstruction to or inconvenience at the pursuers' station."

Their Lordships found in law on these findings of fact that the appellants were not entitled to interdict, and they, therefore, refused the petition, with expenses in the Court of Session and in the inferior court.

The logical connection between these two findings of fact, and between them and the conclusion of law which is deduced from them, is not supplied by any finding, and is not very apparent. The first would be a pertinent finding of fact if it could be affirmed that every hotel-keeper and his servants have, at common law or by statute, a right to enter any railway station and use its platform if they go there for the purpose of accompanying or meeting passengers who are either leaving or have intimated an intention of coming to their hotel, so long as their presence does not cause obstruction or inconvenience. In that case it would be within the competency of an ordinary court of law to enforce such legal right. It is obvious that the second finding might apply with equal truth to many persons who enter a station without having any legal right to do so. The judgment, as framed, does not deal directly with that which is the real and only question of law in the case—namely, what legal right has the respondent to use the General Station at Perth without the leave, and against the will, of its proprietors? As to the views entertained by the learned judges of the Court of Session on that point, very little information can be gleaned from the opinions which they delivered at the advising of the case.

I find that all of them lay great stress on the circumstance that it is within the power of the appellants, if they think fit, to frame regulations for the use of their station, and to submit them for the sanction of the Board of Trade, and that these regulations, if approved of by the board, will be enforceable under penalties. Some of the learned judges have expressly said, while others have plainly suggested, that the proper course for the appellants, in dealing with such claims as are advanced by the respondent, is to proceed by way of regulation, subject to the sanction of the Board of Trade, and not by interdict in a court of law. I cannot concur in that opinion. It appears to me that such regulations are only intended to govern the conduct of those persons whom the owner of the station cannot exclude, or whom he may choose to admit. When their right is permissive merely, and the permission is conditional, I can see no reason why, in order to enforce the condition, a regulation sanctioned by the Board of Trade should be required. I do not think that it was intended by the legislature that the Board of Trade, in making regulations of that kind, should interfere with the jurisdiction of the Railway Commissioners to determine what members of the public, if any, being neither travellers nor interested in goods traffic, should have the right to use a station, or what facilities are to be allowed to them.

The claim which the respondent sets up is, in substance, that he and his hotel servants have legal right to enter on and use the passenger platforms of the Perth General Station without observing the conditions which the appellants have attached to their admission. In my opinion, that is a matter beyond the cognisance of a court of law, which can only deal with legal rights as they exist, and not rights as they might possibly have existed if the Railway Commissioners had been applied to and had affirmed their existence. The learned sheriff-substitute, in affirming by his interlocutor as one of the grounds of his decision that the recognition of the respondent's claims to their full extent would be of convenience to members of what he terms the railway travelling public, does not seem to have thought that he was invading the province of the Railway Commission. Yet it hardly admits of doubt that jurisdiction to determine in the first instance whether the respondent has a statutory title to demand the privilege which he claims, and also whether his claim ought to be allowed, belongs exclusively to that body. Accordingly, these are questions with which I conceive that I have nothing to do in the present case, and on the merits of which I desire to express no opinion.

Apart from any facilities which might possibly be given him by the Railway Commissioners, whose intervention has never been invoked either by the respondent or by anyone on his behalf, has the respondent any right capable of being legally enforced to use the appellants' station at all, or on any other conditions that the appellants choose to prescribe? That is a cardinal question in this case, and one to which I cannot find that any attempt has been made to give a satisfactory reply

A in the courts below. The respondent makes no claim as one of the members of the travelling public, or a person interested in goods conveyed by rail to or from the appellants' station. His counsel, in the absence of any materials for a stronger argument, very fairly and plausibly maintained that the respondent was invited to use the station, and that, when using it in response to such invitation, he could not be deprived of his natural liberty to clothe his servant with any badge or garment which he chose, and also that the adoption of an hotel badge or uniform was required in the interest and for the convenience of railway travellers who were to arrive at the station on their way to his hotel. The first of these arguments fails because it is not shown that any invitation was held out to the respondent which was not coupled with the intimation that he was not to send any servant to the station with a badge or uniform. As regards the second, it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that the respondent is not one of the railway travelling public who frequent his hotel. So far as it appears, none of them has complained that facilities to which they were entitled have been withheld from them by the appellants; and, even if he or they had just cause of complaint, they could have no redress except by an application to the Railway Commissioners.

D It is no doubt true that, while the appellants are vested with the ownership and administration of the station, their statutory powers were conferred on them by the legislature, as in the case of railway companies, with a view to the accommodation of the public. But the legislature has not committed to the ordinary tribunals of the country the duty of determining whether the implied obligation of giving accommodation to the public has been duly fulfilled. When a member of the public having the right to use a railway or a station has reason, or without reason E thinks fit, to complain that some facility has been withheld from him, or that an undue preference has been shown to others, a court of law can give him no remedy. He must resort to the tribunal which the legislature has constituted for that purpose—the Railway Commissioners—and, until they have decided in his favour, he is not in a position to say, and no court is entitled to hold, that he stands possessed of the right which he claims. His claims to use the appellants' station, which F have been maintained in defence by the respondent, appear to me to be in excess of any legal right which he possessed. In my opinion, so long as there is no decision to the contrary by the Railway Commissioners, it is within the discretion of the appellants either to exclude him and his servants from the station, or to admit them on such conditions as may be thought fit. The right of the respondent, if he can be said to have any right, must depend on the extent of the licence accorded G to him by the appellants. It might have been a reasonable course, had it been adopted at an earlier stage of these proceedings, to stay the present suit until the respondent had an opportunity, either by himself or through some other person having a more direct interest, of bringing his claims, such as they are, under the consideration of the Railway Commissioners. But seeing that the respondent has H persisted in relying on his supposed legal rights, with the barren result of three years' unprofitable litigation, I think that your Lordships ought now to dispose of the case as it stands.

This action, although in the form of a petition of interdict, was obviously brought for the purpose of obtaining the judgment of a court of law on the relative rights of the parties as they existed at the date of the petition, and still exist; and, although the conclusions for interdict are so framed that they might be made to I square with that view of their relative rights which I have ventured to suggest, I have come to the conclusion that the more expedient course for your Lordships to follow is to make a declaration in regard to the right, or want of right, of the respondent in such terms as will not exclude him from the benefit of any order or regulation which may hereafter be made by the Railway Commissioners. I am satisfied of the competency of taking that course, and I see no reason to apprehend that the respondent will proceed to act in excess of his rights as defined by the House.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Their Lordships of the Court of Session all agree in thinking that the broad question—which seems to me to be the only possible question in the case—was not properly raised, but, with the exception of LORD TRAYNER, they all expressed an opinion adverse to the right claimed by the appellants. The Lord Justice-Clerk says: “This is a somewhat novel case.” He adds: “Indeed, none of the cases which were referred to in the course of the argument come near to it at all.” He holds that a servant of an hotel going with passengers, or going to meet passengers, is going on what is “plainly in itself perfectly lawful business.” So he is, I should say. But it may be “that he is going too far when he forces his way into a place which he is forbidden by a competent authority to enter.” He says that it would be “a very extraordinary thing” if an interdict should be granted against the respondent “from unlawfully entering or trespassing upon any of the railways, stations, and other works or premises of the pursuers.” Why so, I should ask, if he insists on making an entry which is unlawful? His Lordship adds: “The station is a place which he has a right to enter into, and in the course of business may require to enter.” That is just the question. If the station is open, can he enter it at all times and under all circumstances, or only when he is travelling, or about to travel, by the railway; or can he, as the court seems to think, give himself the right to enter by attaching himself, with or without a special invitation, to persons who have the right to enter. It can hardly be enough that, in the course of business—that is, for his own profit—he may require to enter. LORD YOUNG says that the general proposition advanced on behalf of the appellants is “not maintainable.” LORD MONCRIEFF calls it “a startling proposition,” which, as at present, he is, he says, not prepared to affirm.

I have the misfortune to differ from the learned judges of the Second Division on almost every point. I venture to think, with deference, that their findings in fact are not relevant. On the other hand, it seems to me that the general proposition which was advanced on behalf of the appellants, and was put forward plainly enough in argument, whatever may be said about the pleadings, is well founded in law. I think, too, that the general proposition is sufficiently raised by the claim to interdict the respondent from unlawfully entering or trespassing on the station, because I agree with the Court of Queen’s Bench (Foulger v. Steadman (2)) in their view that if a man not using, or being desirous of using, the railway enters on railway premises after being forbidden to do so, or stays on the railway premises after being requested to leave, he commits a wilful trespass within the Railway Regulation Act, 1840, and none the less so because he claims some right which cannot exist at law. Nor can I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk that the case is a novel one. It seems to me that the question of law was decided, and decided rightly, forty years ago, by the Court of Common Pleas in Barker v. Midland Rail. Co. (1), to which, unfortunately, the attention of the learned judges of the Second Division was not directed.

It was made a matter of complaint that the appellants did not avail themselves of the summary mode of proceedings given them by the Railway Regulation Act, 1840. But it must be remembered that the respondent had ample warning, and that he insisted on entering the appellants’ station as a matter of right. Having regard to the view that has been taken of this case by the different courts in Scotland before whom the matter has been brought, I think that it is by no means unlikely that magistrates would have refused to convict the respondent of wilfully trespassing on the railway, and I may observe that, although according to the decision of the Court of Queen’s Bench in Foulger v. Steadman (2), the respondent was a wilful trespasser within the meaning of the Railway Act, 1840, there is an earlier decision of the same court, when presided over by LORD CAMPBELL, in which it was held that the justices were not bound to find a person who came on the land of a railway under the belief that he was entitled to do so, a wilful trespasser: Jones v. Taylor (3).

A If your Lordships maintain the rights asserted by the appellants, I do not think that there is any reason to apprehend that the decision will be followed by any of those painful separations between members of the same family which LORD YOUNG seems to contemplate as possible. Railway companies are not insensible to public opinion, or indifferent to motives of self-interest. They are more likely, I think, to be too lax than too rigorous in the exclusion of the public from their stations.

B Everyone knows that there have been occasions when railway stations have been used for purposes somewhat foreign to the accommodation of travellers. As the respondent does not claim any special or peculiar right to enter on the appellants' property, but rests his case on the supposed rights of the public, I do not think that it is necessary that he should be placed under an interdict. It will probably be sufficient that a declaration should be made in general terms. It seems to me that

C it would be enough to declare that the appellants are entitled to exclude from their premises all persons other than those who use, or are desirous of using, one or other of the railways served by their station.

D LORD DAVEY.—I so entirely agree in the opinion of LORD MACNAGHTEN, which I have read, that I have not thought it necessary to prepare an opinion of my own.

E LORD MORRIS.—I am unable to concur in the judgment which has been moved by the Lord Chancellor. The action in this case is an action on a petition for interdict. The subject-matter on which the interdict is sought appears in the prayer of that petition. It is that the respondent Alexander Ross, "himself or by his 'boots'" should be restrained "from unlawfully entering or trespassing on any of the railways, stations, or other works or premises of the pursuers." Stopping there, it appears to me that that is entirely too vague standing by itself. I apprehend that it would be necessary in a petition for interdict to state the circumstances and the specific terms on which the person who is to be interdicted is to be prevented from doing that which he seeks. This is merely a general statement

F that the defender in the action should not unlawfully trespass on the station and premises of the pursuers. The mere use of the word "unlawfully" cannot give to it any particular validity. If it were private property absolutely, the entry on it without the assent of the owner would be unlawful, but in this case it was conceded and admitted in argument on behalf of the appellants that a passenger had a perfect right to go on the station if he intended to use the railway.

G Therefore, in its generality this statement cannot, in my opinion, be sustained. And that appears to have been the idea of the pleader, because, having stated it in these general terms, he points out and particularises the matters on which the respondent should be interdicted. No. 1 is "from so entering or trespassing in or upon the Perth General Railway Station, or other works or premises therewith connected, while wearing the uniform or badge of the defender Alexander Ross."

H The second is, "and from awaiting the arrival of passenger trains therein for the purpose of obtaining customers for said hotel." The answer to the latter of those particular subjects for interdict is that the facts have been found against the appellants. It has been decided as a matter of fact that the respondent, or his "boots," were not there for the purpose of obtaining customers, or, as is familiarly called, touting for customers, but were there for the purpose of meeting customers

I who had given an intimation that they were coming. Therefore, that ground cannot be sustained, as a matter of fact it being found against the appellants.

Therefore, the whole petition subsides into that portion of it which deals with the respondent or his servants entering the station wearing a particular badge. If he had a right to enter the station he had a right to enter it wearing any sort of badge or costume he wished. I do not feel inclined to follow this subject deeper, because it has been fully and adequately dealt with by LORD TRAYNER in the Court of Session, and I entirely adopt his reasoning. I am, therefore, of opinion that this petition for an interdict could not be sustained. But it has not been dealt with in your Lordships' House on the prayer of the petition. It has now been decided, or is about to be decided, that the appellants are not entitled to a grant of their petition of interdict, which, as I understand, would make the respondent amenable to contempt of court if he violated it, but a declaration is to be made of the rights between the parties. I am of opinion that that should be done, if at all, in a suit instituted by the appellants for that purpose, and that it should not be given as a relief on a petition of interdict which, as I understand, is an entirely different species of suit followed by entirely different consequences. There would have been nothing to prevent the appellants, if the order of the Court of Session was affirmed, from instituting, on the grounds I have stated, a suit for a declaration of right. What the course that would have been taken in that case by the present respondent would have been I cannot say. It is possible that he might resist it—it is probable that he might resist it—I do not know; but that is not the case which he came to meet. The case which he came to meet was decided in his favour by the sheriff-substitute of Perthshire, by the sheriff court, and by the unanimous judgment of the Court of Session. In this case, however, the respondent is made to pay the costs of the entire suit in a matter in which there has been, as it appears to my mind, a change of front to a certain extent, inasmuch as the petition of interdict is not persevered in, but a declaration of right is substituted for it. On these grounds, I am of opinion that the order of the Court of Session should be affirmed.

Where a court had ordered a company to be wound-up and the official receiver had made a preliminary report, the court was held to have no jurisdiction to direct the public examination of a person under s. 8 (3) of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, without a further report by the official receiver under s. 8 (2) of the Act of 1890 stating that, in his opinion, a fraud had been committed in the promotion or formation of the company or by a director or other officer of the company since its formation, and that the person proposed to be examined had taken part in the promotion or formation of the company or had been a director or officer of the company and against him a prima facie case of fraud has been disclosed in the further report.

Appeal by the official receiver against an order, made in May, 1895, of the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY and KAY, L.JJ.) affirming an order, made in March, 1895, of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., refusing an ex parte application of the official receiver for an order that certain persons (named in the schedule to his preliminary report) be directed to attend for public examination pursuant to s. 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890.

On Nov. 7, 1894, the English and Scottish Mercantile Investment Trust, Ltd., was ordered to be wound up by the court. On Mar. 11, 1895, the official receiver made his preliminary report, under s. 8 (1) of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, in which he stated that in his opinion a further inquiry was desirable as to the failure of the company and the conduct of the business and for that purpose a public examination of persons named in the schedule thereto should be held. The official receiver appealed. A

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.), Ingle Joyce, and W. B. Lindley for the appellant.

The respondents did not appear.

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot help thinking, with the utmost deference to the judicial opinions that have been given, that the provisions of s. 8 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, are reasonably plain. The legislature for very obvious reasons—obvious I mean when one looks at what the course of legislation has been with reference to the formation of companies, and the conduct and management of them—thought that there might be cases in which it would be very desirable to have persons who might be supposed to have some personal interest in the conduct and management of companies brought to the test of a public examination; and accordingly the legislature—the court in the first instance having made an order for winding-up a company—imposed upon the official receiver a duty, as soon as practicable after the receipt of a statement of the company's affairs, to submit a preliminary report to the court. That preliminary report was to contain “the amount of capital issued, subscribed, and paid-up, and the estimated amount of assets and liabilities.” That was an actual duty cast upon the official receiver. If the company had failed, he was to report “as to the causes of the failure,” and whether in the opinion of the official receiver “further inquiry is desirable as to any matter relating to the promotion, formation, or failure of the company, or the conduct of the business thereof.” So far there seems to be no difficulty, and no necessity for further exposition of the object and meaning of the legislation that was then arrived at. B

But then there came what seems to me to be an absolutely independent and separate set of provisions, and that was, that if the official receiver thought fit he was to make a further report. The expression “if he thinks fit” must of course mean if he arrives at a judicial conclusion in his own mind that such facts are before him, and in truth, that it becomes his duty. It is left to him to do it if he thinks fit. It is not made necessary for him to do it in every case, but only in such cases as in his judgment demand such a course to be pursued. Section 8 (2) of the Act of 1890 says that the official receiver may F

“if he thinks fit make a further report or further reports, stating the manner in which the company was formed, and whether in his opinion any fraud has been committed by any person in the promotion or formation of the company, or by any director or other officer of the company in relation to the company since the formation thereof, and any other matters which in his opinion it is desirable to bring to the notice of the court.” G

The whole question turns upon s. 8 (3) of the Act of 1890 which begins with these words, “The court may after consideration of any such report.” H

The first question which arises is as to a point on which counsel relies; he says he relies upon the literal meaning of the words. I confess that, to my mind, reading those words as I have read them, it seems to me reasonably plain that the word “such” there refers to the last preceding provision, viz., s. 8 (2), and that what the draftsman was doing was this: After having provided for these general reports, which have reference to the status and conduct of the company and its affairs, he goes on to provide that where a specific report has been made with reference to some person who has committed a fraud (I will say a word presently as to what I mean by “some person”) the court is then invested with a new jurisdiction by s. 8 (3) which provides: I

“The court may after consideration of any such report, direct that any person who has taken any part in the promotion or formation of the company, or has

- A been a director or officer of the company, shall attend before the court on a day appointed by the court for that purpose and be publicly examined as to the promotion or formation of the company, or as to the conduct of the business of the company, or as to his conduct and dealings as a director or officer of the company."
- B In the first place, it is obvious to inquire what can be the sense or meaning of those provisions unless they have reference to the report which calls attention to the fact that some person has committed a fraud in the promotion or formation of the company. Those two provisions seem to be correlative. What is the sense or meaning of them unless they are correlative? And, if they are, certain consequences are to follow. What are the consequences? At first sight, one would say
- C that, if the object is a public examination, and if the public examination is to be upon the subject which has been by the hypothesis called to the attention of the court by any such report, the person against whom the allegation is made is naturally the person who is to be brought before the court and examined in respect of it. I mean the broadest possible view of any such legislation would at once suggest that the person who has been reported as guilty of fraud is to be examined, and he must answer—he is to be summoned to answer upon the subject. Certain
- D consequences follow upon that. If he is summoned, and if he is exculpated, he is to get his costs; if not, he is to be brought there at his own expense. There are provisions whereby, before he is examined (s. 8 (7) ),

... The person examined shall, at his own cost, prior to such examination, be furnished with a copy of the official receiver's report, and shall also, at his own cost, be entitled to employ at such examination, a solicitor with or without counsel, who shall be at liberty to put such questions, . . ."

- If all these provisions have reference to a person who is incriminated by the report, and is brought there in the position of a person against whom a suggestion is made that he has been guilty of fraud, the whole system, the whole code thereby created
- F is intelligible and rational, and one can understand what the meaning of each part of it is; each part of it reflects light upon the rest. But if, because A. has been found guilty—I mean found guilty in a preliminary sense, that is to say, that a preliminary case has been made against him as being guilty of fraud, if because he has been in that sense incriminated by the official receiver—B. can be summoned, and B. can be made subject to all these consequences, although no preliminary
- G charge of fraud has been made against him at all, the whole thing becomes irrational and unintelligible.

- I confess that I entertain not the smallest doubt that the meaning of this legislation is that in order to give the court jurisdiction to make such an order, there must be a finding of fraud, and a finding of fraud against an individual who is made by that finding subject to be summoned before the court, and is compelled
- H to answer whether the answer incriminates him or not, but being exculpated receives his costs. I confess that I am unable, looking at the whole of the legislation on the subject, to entertain the least doubt that that was what the legislature intended, and I am a little surprised, I confess, that there should have been any doubt that fraud must be found; by which I do not mean that the particular word "fraud" must be used, but that such facts must be found by the official receiver
- I as suggest fraud against the person incriminated, and that there must be an individual person incriminated; it is not that there is a general finding that fraud as suggest fraud against the person incriminated, and that there must be an individual person pointed to, and in respect of whom all these different provisions for his protection, as well as for his being made an example of, become perfectly reasonable. In the event of there being no fraud found, or in the event of there being no individual pointed out as being suggested to be guilty of fraud, I entertain no doubt that the court has no jurisdiction to make any such order for a public examination.

All the observations that have been addressed to us with reference to the necessity of an inquiry, and so forth, are disposed of by the mere existence of s. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862 [then unrepealed]. There are there ample means of inquiry; no injustice or want of investigation into the affairs of the company can possibly occur if that provision is put into force. This latter provision is of itself and by itself, a kind of penal section against a fraudulent director, officer, or promoter; and, inasmuch as it is directed to that person, and to that person alone, it seems to me that it follows as essential to the jurisdiction of the court that there should be a preliminary finding which is the foundation of that jurisdiction, namely, that fraud has been committed by the individual person who is pointed out by the report, and, in the absence of that finding, I am of opinion that the court would have no jurisdiction. Under these circumstances I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed.

LORD WATSON.—I am of opinion that the court has no statutory jurisdiction to direct a public examination under s. 8 (3) of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, except upon consideration of a further report made by the official receiver in terms of sub-s. (2). I am also of opinion that the power committed to the court by that sub-section has no application to any one of the persons therein mentioned who is not inculpated in this sense, that a prima facie case of fraud on his part is disclosed by the further report. I, therefore, concur in the judgment that has been moved.

LORD HERSCHELL.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the natural construction of the words “any such report,” in sub-s. (3) of s. 8 of the Act of 1890 is to refer them to the report or reports which are mentioned in sub-s. (2). But, in addition to that, it seems to me that the other provisions contained in s. 8 make it clear that such must have been the meaning. Sub-section (7) applies to every case in which an order for examination is made; and I think sub-s. (7) is only reasonably applicable in the case of a person inculpated in a report of the official receiver. Of course, I do not mean for a moment to suggest that the official receiver must use any particular language in the report which he makes under sub-s. (2); it must appear from that report that in his opinion a fraud has been committed by A. or B. or C., as the case may be, in order to justify an order for the examination of A. or B. or C. Of course, no form of words would be necessary, and, although the matter is left to the discretion of the official receiver, I think none the less that it would be his duty to exercise that discretion in the particular way of making a report, if, in his opinion, there were a case of fraud established by the facts against any person or persons.

These provisions I think must be read in the light of the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, which were left existing when the later legislation was passed. The court had the fullest power to summon before it anyone it pleased within the limits specified in s. 115 of that Act, which I think would have included any person whom it thought fit who could give information that would tend to proceedings for the recovery of money for the benefit of the company. And I think that an object, if not the only object, of sub-s. (1) of s. 8 of the Act of 1890 was to impose on the official receiver at an early period the duty of bringing before the court information upon certain matters connected with the company which would be very important in guiding the judgment of the court as to the persons who ought to be summoned under s. 115 of the Act of 1862. I think that there is a purpose amply sufficient to be served by the report under sub-s. (1) of s. 8 of the Act of 1890 without supposing that it was intended upon that report to found the proceedings referred to in sub-s. (3) and the following sub-sections.

In s. 115 of the Act of 1862, although all the persons there referred to might be summoned, they could only be summoned on a tender to them of their reasonable expenses of coming to be examined. When we deal with these provisions, which

A it must be remembered are intended to operate side by side with s. 115, we find that the expense in the first instance is cast absolutely upon the person to be examined. He must bear even the expense of knowing what he is to be examined about; the official receiver's report is only to be had upon those terms; and the later provisions (as to which I will say something in a moment), about allowing him costs if he exculpates himself from the charges, show that intention clearly. That is perfectly intelligible if you suppose that the person referred to in sub-s. (3) of s. 8 of the Act of 1890 and the subsequent sub-sections is an inculpatd person, otherwise it is unintelligible. If he is not a person who is prima facie to blame, why should he be put to the expense of ascertaining what the charge against him is, why should all the costs be thrown upon him, and why should he not have any expenses tendered to him? It is quite unintelligible why he should be put in that position if he is a person in no way appearing to be inculpatd.

When one comes to look at sub-s. (7) it is quite clear that the court can only allow expenses to a person ordered to attend for examination if, in the opinion of the court, he is exculpated from any of the charges made or suggested against him. Both the Attorney-General and junior counsel conceded that those words were only applicable when the person was inculpatd in the report of the official receiver. If their construction is right, you have this preposterous result: you have A., we will say, inculpatd in the report on a charge of fraud; it is suggested that B. and C. were co-directors with him, or co-officials of some kind or other, and you have an order made, and, as they say, properly made, for the examination of A. and B. and C.; and then on the examination it turns out that none of these persons were to blame. Then A. applies for his costs—"Yes," say the court, "you are exculpated and we will give you your costs." But when B. and C. come, the answer is "No, you have not been exculpated because you were never charged, and therefore you must bear the expenses yourself." Such legislation would be nothing short of absolutely preposterous. The only construction of the legislation that can make it reasonable is that the only persons who can be ordered to be examined and attend at their own expense are those who are prima facie inculpatd. It is quite reasonable that they should be required to attend at their own expense. They are saved from injustice by the provision that, if they are exculpated, the court can, and doubtless will, give them their costs. If, on the other hand, persons could be examined at their own expense who could not be allowed their costs, however clear it might be that they had done nothing whatever that could be the subject of blame, the provision would be certainly very harsh, very unjust, and very unreasonable.

Therefore, when all the provisions are regarded together, and also the enactment existing in s. 115 of the Act of 1862, it seems to me that the intention of the legislature is reasonably clear. Nor is there any mischief, that I can see, likely to arise from such a construction. If it were the case that the report of the official receiver on such a point must be made once for all, so that if there appeared a prima facie case against A. for a public examination he never afterwards could make a report which would lead to the public examination of B. or C., it might be said that mischief might arise. But it is clear that if there is not at the outset a case of fraud shown against anybody but A., then B. and C., who are officials of the company, and are supposed to know something, or may perhaps be suspected of being concerned in something, which was improper, can still be summoned for examination under s. 115 of the Act of 1862. It may well be that something which transpires in the public examination of A. will show the necessity of summoning B. or C. under s. 115. If when they are examined under s. 115, it turns out that there is no cause for believing them to have been guilty of fraud, the matter will of course end there; they will have been examined, they will have given all the information they can, and no further step will be necessary. But if that leads to a prima facie case of fraud against them, they are not to be exempted in any way from a public examination; it is still open to the official receiver to make a further report about their conduct, upon which the public examination will ensue. It seems to me, therefore, that while the construction which your Lordships' House is putting upon this A section will in many cases prevent injustice, it will in no case prevent injustice being done and the fullest inquiry being made in all legitimate cases.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

LORD MORRIS.—I concur. B

LORD SHAND.—I also concur, and I only venture to add to what has been said by LORD HERSCHELL that it occurs to me that there might be an examination of directors other than those named originally without having recourse to s. 115 of the Act of 1862. I venture to suggest that, if it appeared upon the examination of a person, A., who had been inculpated, that B. and C. were in a somewhat similar C position, then the official receiver might in that case make a second or further report without having recourse to the powers under s. 115 of the Act of 1862. In all other respects I quite agree with what my noble and learned friends have said.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In consequence of what my noble and learned friend has just said, I wish to explain that I did not intend to imply that procedure under D s. 115 of the Act of 1862 would be a condition precedent to any further report justifying any further order, but merely that what came out might render an examination under s. 115 desirable, and that it might be taken notwithstanding the previous report.

LORD DAVEY.—I concur. E

Company—Shares—Preference shares—Issue by alteration of articles by special resolution—Power in memorandum to increase capital as provided by articles—No provision in memorandum or articles providing for priority of any shares.

A limited company was empowered by its memorandum of association to increase its capital as provided by the articles. The articles provided that the company might increase its capital, any such increase to be considered as part of the original capital and to be subject to the same provisions. There was no provision either in the memorandum or in the articles for the priority of any shares. The company altered its articles by special resolution to authorise the issue of preference shares and subsequently increased its capital by the issue of preference shares. I

Held: the company had power to alter its articles by special resolution to enable it to increase its capital by the issue of preference shares; there was no

A implied condition in the memorandum that all shareholders were to be on an equality; and, therefore, the issue of the preference share was valid.

Appeal by the preference shareholders of the Gas Meter Co., Ltd., from a decision of KEKEWICH, J., in an action by the ordinary shareholders against the company and the preference shareholders for declarations concerning the validity of the issue of the preference shares and as to the distribution of reserves. The preference shareholders only appealed on the question as to the validity of the preference shares and made no claim as to the reserves. A

The company was formed and registered as a limited company under the Companies Act, 1856, and on Oct. 24, 1862, was registered under the Companies Act, 1862. Clause 5 of the memorandum of association provided as follows :

“The nominal capital of the company is £60,000 divided into 600 shares of £100 each, every share being subdivisible into fifths, with power to increase the capital as provided by the articles of association.” B

The articles of association which accompanied the memorandum and were registered with it provided (by art. 27) that the company might, with the sanction of a general meeting, increase its capital; (by art. 28) that any capital raised by the creation of new shares should be considered as part of the original capital and should be subject to the same provisions in all respects as if it had been part of the original capital. But neither in the memorandum nor in the articles was there any provision for the preference or priority of any of the shares. Shares amounting to nearly £60,000 were issued as fully paid-up. C

In 1865 the company purchased a business of manufacturing meters for which the company partly paid by issuing and allotting to the vendor 100 shares of £100 each fully paid-up and having a preferential dividend of 5 per cent. These shares were issued in pursuance of a special resolution passed under s. 50 and s. 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, which added to the original articles of the company the following articles which provided (inter alia) : D

“Article 98. The directors may issue by way of creation of capital 100 shares of £100 each fully paid-up, bearing in manner hereinafter mentioned from Jan. 1, 1865, a preference dividend of £5 per cent. per annum to be allotted to [the vendor of the business] in part payment of the consideration for the purchase of [the business].” E

“Article 99. The preference dividend of £5 per share on . . . the 100 shares . . . shall be payable out of the profits of the company for the current year so far as such . . . shall be a charge on the profits or assets of the company in any subsequent year.” F

“Article 100. The . . . 100 shares shall not entitle the holder thereof to vote in the company or to any participation in . . . bonuses or any dividend beyond £5 per share per annum.”

“Article 101. . . . the 100 shares shall be considered and treated as no part of the paid-up share capital for the purpose of apportioning . . . bonuses.” G

Dividends paid on the ordinary shares since 1862 had ranged from 6 to 17½ per cent. and there were in addition reserves, of, £35,000 representing profits available for distribution among the shareholders.

Feb. 6, 1897. LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment of the court in which after stating the facts, he continued :—The question raised by the appeal is whether certain preference shares issued by a limited company as long ago as 1865 were validly issued or not. If they were not, a further question will arise, which is—what are the rights of their present holders? The company has been prosperous, and the ordinary shareholders have for years received a higher dividend than the preference shareholders. A considerable reserve has been also accumulated, and in the action which has been brought to determine the rights of the preference shareholders to this reserve fund, the learned judge has held that the creation of the preference shares was ultra vires, and that their holders never became and are not now shareholders in the company, and that they have none of the rights of share- I

A holders, whether preference or ordinary. He has not, however, declared more definitely what their rights are. The preference shareholders have appealed from this decision, but on the appeal they only claimed to be preference shareholders entitled to a preferential dividend of 5 per cent. Their claim to any share of the reserve fund was dropped.

B The judgment against the validity of the preference shares is based upon the well-known case of Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. (1), (2), which came twice before KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in 1865, and which KEKEWICH, J., very naturally held to be binding on him. The first decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C. (Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. A. (1)), was that a limited company which had not issued the whole of its original capital could not issue the unallotted shares as preference shares unless authorised so to do by its memorandum of association, or by its articles of association. This decision was affirmed on appeal, and was obviously correct; and would have been correct even if the whole of the original capital had been issued, and the preference shares had been new and additional capital. The company, however, afterwards passed a special resolution altering the articles and authorising an issue of preference shares. This raised an entirely different question, and led to the second decision (Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2)). D KINDERSLEY, V.-C., granted an injunction restraining the issue of the preference shares, and he held distinctly that the resolution altering the articles was ultra vires. He did so on the ground, as we understand his judgment, that there was in the memorandum of association a condition that all the shareholders should stand on an equal footing as to the receipt of dividends, and that this condition was one which E could not be got rid of by a special resolution altering the articles of association under the powers conferred by ss. 50 and 51 of the Companies Act, 1862.

The judgment of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., is a little obscure, because he treats the condition as a condition of the constitution of the company, and he may have meant by that expression either the constitution as fixed by the memorandum of association or the constitution as fixed by the memorandum of association and the original F articles. But unless he had meant the constitution of the company as fixed by the memorandum of association his decision is unintelligible; for, so far as the constitution depended on the articles, it clearly could be altered by special resolution under the powers conferred by s. 50 and s. 51 of that Act. A company cannot deprive itself of this power: see Malleon v. National Insurance and Guarantee Corpn. (3) and Walker v. London Tramways Co. (4). KINDERSLEY, V.-C., further seems to have G been of opinion that the condition could be excluded by contemporaneous articles of association, and his decision has been so understood by succeeding judges. Accordingly, in 1875, in Harrison v. Mexican Rail. Co. (5), SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., held that the condition of equality imported into the memorandum of association by the decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., was negated by one of the articles of association filed with the memorandum, and which article authorised the creation of additional H capital by the issue of new shares, "in such manner, to such amount, and to be with and subject to such rules, regulations, privileges, and conditions" as the company should think fit.

In our opinion, it is impossible to uphold this decision, or the view of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., himself, as to the effect of articles on the memorandum, if it is once conceded that it is a condition in the memorandum of association that there shall be equality I amongst the shareholders. If the condition is really one of the conditions of the memorandum it is immaterial whether the condition is express or implied. If the memorandum of association really prescribed equality among all the shareholders, as KINDERSLEY, V.-C., held that it did, the articles of association could not override the memorandum of association in that particular: see s. 12 of the Companies Act, 1862, and Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (6) (L.R. 7 H.L. at p. 667), and Guinness v. Land Corpn. of Ireland (7). The departure thus made by SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., from the principle on which KINDERSLEY, V.-C., based the second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2) was sanctioned by the Court of Appeal in 1885 in Re South Durham Brewery Co. (8), and again in 1887 in Re Bridgewater Navigation Co., Ltd. (9), a case which, although reversed on another point, was not questioned on the point now under consideration. A

These decisions turned upon the principle that, although by s. 8 of the Companies Act, 1862, the memorandum is to state the amount of the original capital and the number of shares into which it is to be divided, yet in other respects the rights of the shareholders in respect of their shares and the terms on which additional capital may be raised are matters to be regulated by the articles of association rather than by the memorandum, and are, therefore, matters which (unless provided for by the memorandum as in Ashbury v. Watson (10) ) may be determined by the company from time to time by special resolution pursuant to s. 50 of that Act. This view, however, clearly negatives the doctrine that there is a condition in the memorandum of association that all shareholders are to be on an equality unless the memorandum itself shows the contrary. That proposition is, in our opinion, unsound. Its unsoundness was distinctly pointed out by LORD MACNAGHTEN in British and American Trustee and Finance Corpn. v. Couper (11). The view taken by KINDERSLEY, V.-C., cannot, in our opinion, be supported by reference to the Companies Act, 1862; and it is inconsistent with the decisions to which we have referred, and which, if wrong, can only now be set right by the House of Lords. B

It was, however, contended that this court, at all events, had approved and followed the decisions of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., and Ashbury v. Watson (10) was referred to on this point. In that case the memorandum of association stated that preferential shares might be created and what the preferential rights were to be; and it was held that these were conditions which could be properly introduced into the memorandum of association, and which, being introduced there, could not be afterwards departed from and be treated as articles of association capable of change. No doubt FRY, L.J., relied on Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2), to show that provisions about preference shares were conditions which could properly be inserted in the memorandum of association, but the propriety of the decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in that case was not before the court, and we do not regard Ashbury v. Watson (10) as conflicting with any of the other decisions of the Court of Appeal, in which the decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., has been judicially considered. E
F

We desire to add that we do not base our judgment in this case on the words "with power to increase the capital as provided by the articles of association," which are in the memorandum of association. That power would have existed under s. 12 of the Companies Act, 1862, if those words had not been in the memorandum. We prefer to rest our decision on the grounds above explained. But the words in the memorandum to which we are now referring certainly show that the conditions on which new capital was to be issued were not to be implied from the memorandum of association, but were to be ascertained from the articles: and as these might be changed from time to time under the powers conferred by s. 50 and s. 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, it would follow from Harrison v. Mexican Rail. Co. (5) and other cases like it that the resolutions of 1865 would be valid, even if the second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2) could still be regarded as good law. For the reasons, however, which we have given we are of opinion that the second decision of KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2) was wrong, and ought not to be followed, and that the decision appealed from must be reversed and the resolutions thereby declared to be ultra vires must be declared intra vires and valid. If, by declining to follow that second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2) we were disturbing titles or embarrassing trade or commerce, we should treat it as one of those decisions which, though wrong, it would be mischievous to overrule. But such is not the case; and it is desirable, from all points of view, to remove from companies a fetter which ought never to have been imposed upon them, and which in practice has been got rid of by skilled draftsmen by the insertion of power to issue preference G
H
I

A shares in the original articles of association or the memorandum of association itself. These devices will no longer be necessary. We understand that there will be no dispute now as to the rights of the preference shareholders, and the costs will be provided for as arranged by the parties.

B RIGBY, L.J.—There is one remark I wish to make with reference to the supposed influence of the second decision in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2) during all this series of years. According to my recollection, from the very first it was looked upon as a doubtful decision, and I doubt if anyone deliberately acted upon it; but after the decision of Harrison v. Mexican Rail. Co. (5), before SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in 1875, I think it was considered extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile that case with Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2). SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., did not profess to overrule the principle of the earlier case, but his decision was based upon a principle which would be equally applicable in the case before KINDERSLEY, V.-C., for in Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2) in the existing articles of association, a contemporaneous document with the memorandum that he was considering, were two articles, 17 and 18, one authorising an increase of capital, and the other saying, “The increased capital shall be raised from time to time in the number of shares, and of the amount and value, and, subject to these articles, on such conditions as the extraordinary general meeting shall direct.” I cannot treat Hutton v. Scarborough Cliff Hotel Co., Ltd. B. (2) from the date of Harrison v. Mexican Rail. Co. (5) as being an unchallenged decision. I think it was virtually overruled from that date.

Child—Neglect—Mens rea—Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 41) s. 1.

I An indictment on which several defendants are charged may contain counts charging offences against individual prisoners as well as counts charging all the prisoners jointly. If it is likely that injustice may be caused by trying all the prisoners together, the court may order them to be tried separately.

On a charge of neglecting a child under the age of sixteen years under s. 1 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894 [now s. 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933], the age of the child may be proved by any lawful evidence.

Per CURIAM: The words in that section “wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes” a child require that not only the assault but also the ill-treatment, neglect, etc., must be wilful.

Notes. The Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, has been repealed. A
For s. 1 of that Act see now s. 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933.
Presumptions as to age in any charge under that Act are contained in s. 99 thereof.

As to trial of two or more defendants, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 415; as to joinder of offences, see ibid. 392; as to neglect of children, see ibid. 760. For cases see 14 DIGEST (Repl.) 253 and 15 DIGEST (Repl.) 1036. For the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, ss. 1, 99, see 12 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) B

Case Stated by the chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions.

Frederic Cox and Isabella Cox were indicted for offences under the Prevention D of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894. The indictment contained nine counts. The second charged that both the defendants,

“being persons over the age of sixteen years respectively, and having the custody and charge of a certain child, to wit, Thomas Enoch Cox, a boy under the age of sixteen years, did unlawfully and wilfully neglect such child in a E manner likely to cause such child unnecessary suffering.”

The third count charged the defendants with wilfully neglecting the child in a manner likely to cause injury to his health; while the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth counts also charged the defendants jointly with these offences in respect of other children. The fourth and fifth counts charged the offences against Isabella Cox with respect to another child. F

The defendants were husband and wife living together, but one of the children was the man's illegitimate child and another the illegitimate child of the woman.
The other children were issue of the marriage. The man was a labourer, and was absent from home all day. Evidence was given at the trial by persons who had seen the children that they were in a filthy condition and infested with vermin, and that the room in which they slept and their bedding were filthy. One of the G children, an infant in arms, was produced in court. With regard to the others, witnesses stated that they had seen the children and believed them to be under sixteen years of age, and the mistress of a public elementary school stated that the eldest children attended the school, and that she believed them to be within the statutory age limit for such schools. This age is “not less than five years nor more than thirteen years” (33 & 34 Vict., c. 75), s. 74 (1) [repealed]. The jury acquitted H Frederic Cox, but convicted Isabella Cox. The questions for the court were (inter alia): (i) Was the indictment bad for including separate charges against each prisoner as well as joint charges against both prisoners? (ii) Was the female prisoner a person who had the custody, charge, or care of the children within the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, s. 1? (iii) Was there any legal evidence of the age, (a) of the children (b) of the parents, to go to the jury? Other questions I were stated, but were not argued before the court.

Stamford Hutton for the prisoner.

Clarke Hall for the Crown.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J.—This case comes before us on a Case stated by the chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, and we have only to deal with the points on which we are asked to express our opinion. But I think

A it right to observe that it was at least open to question whether the direction given by the learned chairman to the jury which is set out in para. 11 of the Case is the proper direction. That direction was as follows :

B "I told the jury that, if they were of opinion on the evidence that the prisoners knew that the children were infested by vermin, that the presence of such vermin was the result of neglect or absence of reasonable care in looking after the children, and that the presence of such vermin caused the children unnecessary suffering that reasonable care would have prevented, they could convict the prisoners."

C The proper direction is to follow the words of the statute, which are that, if any person "wilfully assaults, ill-treats, neglects, abandons, or exposes" a child, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. The assault must be wilful, and it follows that the ill-treatment or neglect must be wilful.

D The first point on which we are asked to express our opinion is, whether the indictment is bad because it contains counts charging the defendants jointly as well as counts in which the defendants are charged singly. It is a well-established principle of law that there may be in one indictment against several defendants counts charging individual prisoners separately and counts charging all the prisoners jointly. This is clear from R. v. Kingston (1). It may in some cases work injustice, as where the evidence of one prisoner is necessary for the defence of another; and there may be cases in which there is some danger of the jury convicting a prisoner on evidence which is only admitted against another. But in such cases the court has power to order that the prisoners be tried separately.

E The next question submitted to us is, was the female prisoner a person who had the custody, charge, or care of the children? There was ample evidence on which the jury might find that she had the custody and charge of the children, and whether she had the custody or charge is a question of fact, she was not indicted as a person having the care of the children. We are then asked whether there was any legal evidence of the age of the children, and of the parents. A certificate of birth coupled with evidence of identity is legal evidence of the age of the person mentioned in it; but that is not the only way in which the age of a person may be proved. It may be proved by any lawful evidence, and in this case there was the evidence of persons who had seen the children and evidence that the eldest attended a public elementary school. As to the age of the parents, to state the question is to answer it. The parents were in the dock, and the jury were able to judge from their appearance as to whether they respectively exceeded sixteen years in age.

HAWKINS, MATHEW, GRANTHAM, and DARLING, JJ., concurred.

SKINNER v. NORTHALLERTON COUNTY COURT JUDGE AND OTHERS

[HOUSE OF LORDS (The Earl of Halsbury, L.C., Lord Macnaghten, Lord Morris, Lord Shand and Lord Brampton), June 22, 1899]

Bankruptcy—County court—Order—Quashing by certiorari.

A county court sitting in bankruptcy possesses all the powers and jurisdiction of the High Court. Consequently, an order of certiorari may not be issued to quash a decision of a county court exercising bankruptcy jurisdiction.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, [1898] 2 Q.B. 680, affirmed.

Notes. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 100, has been repealed and replaced in identical terms by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 103.

Applied: R. v. Central Criminal Court Justices, Ex parte L.C.C., [1925] All E.R. Rep. 429. Considered: Re Debtor (No. 29 of 1931), Ex parte Debtor v. Petitioning Creditors, [1933] All E.R. Rep 749. Referred to: Savill v. Dalton, [1914-15] All E.R. Rep. 313.

As to the jurisdiction of county courts in bankruptcy, see 2 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 253, and for cases see 4 DIGEST (Repl.) 41. For the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 103, see 2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 415.

Appeal by the debtor, Skinner, from the decision of the Court of Appeal (A. L. SMITH, RIGBY, and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ.), reported [1898] 2 Q.B. 680, affirming an order of the Divisional Court (WRIGHT and DARLING, JJ.), discharging a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari.

The appellant was in embarrassed circumstances in April, 1898, and on April 12, he left his home. On April 23 a petition in Bankruptcy was presented against him in the county court of Northallerton, and evidence was given that before the presentation of the petition he had departed from his dwelling-house for the purpose of delaying his creditors, and escaping payment of his debts. On May 9 a receiving order was made, and a meeting of creditors was held on May 11 to which the debtor was summoned, but he did not attend. Application was then made to the county court judge for a warrant for the arrest of the debtor under s. 25 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as amended by s. 7 of the Act of 1890 [see now s. 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914]. The judge ordered a warrant to issue, but the order did not state that there was reason to believe that the debtor "had absconded or was about to abscond," but recited that he was avoiding examination and delaying the proceedings in his bankruptcy. On May 31 he was arrested and was afterwards discharged. He then obtained a rule nisi for an order for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash the order of the county court judge upon the ground that it was made without jurisdiction, and was bad upon the face of it.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 100:

"A county court shall, for the purposes of its bankruptcy jurisdiction, in addition to the ordinary powers of the court, have all the powers and jurisdiction of the High Court, and the orders of the court may be enforced accordingly in manner prescribed."

Horridge and Ryland Adkins for the appellant.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Robert Finlay, Q.C.), Muir Mackenzie and H. Erle Richards for the respondents.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C. It seems to me that this is a very plain case, and I am somewhat surprised that it should have been brought here, because

A it seems to me that the judgments below are perfectly satisfactory, and depend upon very plain principles. The county court in question is a county court which has bankruptcy jurisdiction, and had it at the moment when the order was made; although no bankrupt was there at the time, nor for some time afterwards, still it had a bankruptcy jurisdiction. Then this particular bankrupt had a bankruptcy petition presented against him, and the court, having bankruptcy jurisdiction, was B seised of that bankruptcy proceeding. Thereupon, what is done is within the jurisdiction of that court, and not within the jurisdiction of any other court.

If it were a county court proceeding properly so called, there is a section in the County Courts Act, 1888 [s. 124, now s. 107 of the County Courts Act, 1959: 39 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 182] which, even in respect of those county courts, which have not a bankruptcy jurisdiction, prohibits the issue of a certiorari C in terms except as mentioned in the Act. I am not for the moment concerned with that, although that would dispose of it by another process. But, as a matter of fact, in respect of bankruptcy the statute has given all the powers and jurisdiction which the High Court possesses to a county court sitting in Bankruptcy.

This county court judge was sitting in Bankruptcy, and the confusion which is imported into the case is that because, as I will assume for the moment, the judge D issued a warrant which in form was wrong, but could have been put right, therefore it should have been put right, not in the court in which it was issued, but in the High Court. The absurdity of that is that the statute itself has made the county court the High Court for this purpose. You might just as well argue that a warrant defective in form issued by the Court of Queen's Bench could be set right by certiorari. Of course that is absurd.

E This is the High Court for this purpose. If the warrant was ever so bad, it was issued by a Bankruptcy judge in respect of bankruptcy proceedings which were before him, of which he was seised, a warrant which he had perfect jurisdiction to issue. If there was any irregularity or inaccuracy in point of form in the warrant that did issue, that could be put right by proper proceedings; but the proper proceedings would be in that court itself, and not proceedings by certiorari in the F Court of Queen's Bench. That appears to me abundantly clear, and it would be wasting time to proceed further than to say that the judgment of A. L. SMITH, L.J., seems to me to put the matter perfectly clearly, and I have no desire to add anything to what he said.

Re MACKENZIE. Ex parte SHERIFF OF HERTFORDSHIRE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., Sir Francis Jeune, P., and Romer, L.J.), July 28, August, 4, 1899]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Execution by sheriff under fi. fa.—Notice to sheriff of bankruptcy petition—Payment by sheriff to landlord of arrears of rent—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1709 (8 Anne, c. 18), s. 1 Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict., c. 71), s. 11 (2).

A sheriff, who held the proceeds of a valid sale of the debtor's goods seized under a writ of fieri facias, received a notice within 14 days of the sale under s. 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, to the effect that a bankruptcy petition had been presented against the debtor. After receiving the notice he paid out of the proceeds of execution a claim by the debtor's landlord for one quarter's rent owed to the landlord by the debtor.

Held: s. 11 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, did not take away the rights given to a landlord by s. 1 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1709, and, therefore, the sheriff was entitled to pay the debtor's arrears of rent to the landlord out of the proceeds of the execution before handing them over to the official receiver.

Per CURIAM: The Bankruptcy Acts deprive the landlord of these rights in one case only, viz., where the execution is itself overridden and rendered void by the bankruptcy.

Notes. Section 11 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, was replaced by s. 41 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

E Appeal by the sheriff of Hertfordshire from an order of the Divisional Court (WRIGHT and BIGHAM, JJ.), affirming the decision of the Edmonton County Court.

On Aug. 19, 1898, the sheriff seized the goods of the debtor, Neil Mackenzie, under a writ of fieri facias, and sold them on Sept. 14, 1898. On Sept. 15 the debtor committed an act of bankruptcy. On Sept. 16 notice of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against the debtor was given to the sheriff. On Oct. 6 the debtor's landlord gave notice to the sheriff that he claimed a sum of £32 10s., being one quarter's rent due at Michaelmas, 1898, of the premises on which the execution had taken place. On Oct. 12 the official receiver, in accordance with s. 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, served the sheriff with a formal notice of the petition and receiving order, and a demand for delivery-up of the goods seized or payment of the proceeds of the sale. On Oct. 22 the sheriff out of the proceeds of the execution, and notwithstanding the notice from the official receiver, paid the landlord his quarter's rent, £32 10s., and the rest of the proceeds to the trustee in the bankruptcy. On Feb. 14, 1899, the County Court judge made an order declaring that the sheriff was liable to pay to the trustee the £32 10s. and directing him to pay the same personally. On the appeal of the sheriff to the Divisional Court on June 15, 1899, the decision of the County Court judge was affirmed, and the appeal was dismissed with costs. The sheriff appealed.

By the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1709, s. 1 :

I "No goods or chattels whatsoever, lying or being in or upon any messuage, lands, or tenements, which are or shall be leased for life or lives, term of years, at will or otherwise, shall be liable to be taken by virtue of any execution on any pretence whatsoever, unless the party at whose suit the said execution is sued out shall, before the removal of such goods from off the said premises by virtue of such execution or extent, pay to the landlord of the said premises or his bailiff all such sum or sums of money as are or shall be due for rent for the said premises at the time of the taking of such goods or chattels by virtue of such execution; provided the said arrears of rent do not amount to more than one year's rent; and in case the said arrears shall exceed one year's rent, then the said party at whose suit such execution is sued out, paying the said landlord or his bailiff one year's rent, may proceed to execute his judgment as he might have done before the making of this Act; and the sheriff or other officer is hereby empowered and required to levy and pay to the plaintiff as well the money so paid for rent, as the execution money.”

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 11 (2):

“Where under an execution in respect of a judgment for a sum exceeding twenty pounds the goods of a debtor are sold or money is paid in order to avoid sale, the sheriff shall deduct his costs of the execution from the proceeds of the sale or money paid, and retain the balance for fourteen days, and if within that time notice is served on him of a bankruptcy petition having been presented against or by the debtor, and a receiving order is made against the debtor thereon, or on any other petition of which the sheriff has notice, the sheriff shall pay the balance to the official receiver, or, as the case may be, the trustee, who shall be entitled to retain the same as against the execution creditor.”

Danckwerts and R. D. Muir for the sheriff.

Muir Mackenzie and H. Lynn for the trustee in bankruptcy.

Aug. 4, 1899. SIR NATHANIEL LINDLEY, M.R., read the following judgment of the court.—It will be convenient to consider (i) the rights of a landlord as against his tenant's trustee in bankruptcy where there is no execution against the tenant; (ii) the rights of a landlord against a sheriff who has seized the tenant's goods where there is no bankruptcy; (iii) the rights of a landlord and of the sheriff where the goods of the tenant have been seized by the sheriff under an execution and the tenant has afterwards become bankrupt.

(i) The bankruptcy of a tenant does not prevent a distress by the landlord. It was long ago decided that a commission of bankruptcy and possession by the assignees or the messenger did not place the tenant's goods in custodia legis so as to protect them from distress: GILBERT ON DISTRESS (3rd Edn.) 44; Anon (2); and Briggs v. Sowry (3). If the landlord, having power to distrain, did not distrain and the goods were removed by the assignees, he could prove for his rent, and that was his only remedy: (ibid.). Modern Bankruptcy Acts have not altered the law in this respect except that they have limited the right to distrain after bankruptcy to rent accruing six months or less before the date of the order of adjudication: Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 42, as amended by the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 28 [see now s. 35 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914]. Nothing in the present case turns on this limitation.

(ii) Next as to executions. A tenant's goods, seized by a sheriff under writ of execution, could not be distrained for rent. They were said to be in custodia legis and protected from seizure by the landlord: GILBERT ON DISTRESS (3rd Edn.) 40; Wharton v. Naylor (4). Nor could he, before the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1709, by giving the sheriff notice or otherwise, obtain payment by the sheriff out of the moneys realised by him by the sale of the goods seized. The law in this respect was, however, altered by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1709, s. 1. This statute did not give the landlord a right to distrain, but it prohibited the removal of the goods seized by the sheriff until the landlord's rent in arrear (not exceeding one year's rent) had been paid by the execution creditor. The Act was so worded as to raise the question whether it imposed upon the sheriff the duty of ascertaining whether any rent was in arrear or not before allowing the goods seized to be removed; but it was early decided that it was not the sheriff's duty to inquire, and that he was under no liability to the landlord for not keeping the goods unless informed that rent was due: GILBERT ON DISTRESS (3rd Edn.) 41; Waring v. Dewberry (5); Palgrave v. Windham (6); Arnitt v. Garnett (7).

But if the sheriff had notice before the goods were removed that rent was due to the landlord, and the sheriff, nevertheless, did not keep the goods on the premises, but sold them without paying the landlord, the sheriff was liable to an action by

A the landlord for the wrongful removal: Riscley v. Ryle (8); Andrews v. Dixon (9); Colyer v. Speer (10). The Act in effect impounded the goods for the landlord's benefit; they could not be removed until he was paid. To this extent the Act in terms gave him a right to have them preserved as a security for one year's arrears due to him. He could not, however, require them to be sold for his benefit; and

B if they were sold he could not maintain an action against the sheriff for money had and received: Green v. Austin (11). His remedy was by an action on the statute for wrongful removal without paying him: see a form of declaration, 2 CHITTY ON PLEADING, 629. If the execution creditor chose to pay the landlord, the goods were sold by the sheriff and he applied the proceeds in paying his own expenses and the judgment debt and the amount paid by the execution creditor to the landlord for the rent in arrear. The Act itself authorised this. But unless the execution

C creditor or the tenant paid the landlord his rent in arrear (not exceeding one year's arrears), the Act might produce a deadlock. If the sheriff sold the goods and they were removed, he was liable to an action by the landlord: see as to the damages recoverable Thomas v. Mirehouse (12). So long as the landlord was unpaid, the sheriff could not be compelled to sell the goods; and an action by an execution

D creditor for not selling could not be sustained against him: Cocker v. Musgrove (13). The sheriff might retain possession; but when it became plain that no one would pay the landlord, the sheriff could withdraw and return nulla bona to the writ: see Thomas v. Mirehouse (12) and Wintle v. Freeman (14). As soon as he withdrew the landlord could distrain for his whole rent in arrear. Such were the strict rights of the parties.

E But now, suppose the sheriff sold and deprived the landlord of what was practically his lien on the goods, and then, to save himself from an action by the landlord, paid him out of the proceeds of the sale or handed the proceeds of the sale to him in part discharge of the rent due to him. Strictly speaking, this would be irregular unless the landlord consented; but, even if he did not, still no one would be damnified if the sale was fairly conducted. The landlord would have

F nothing to complain of, for he would get his money, so far at all events as the goods seized could be made available for his payment. The execution debtor would not be damnified, for he owed the rent and he could not get his goods without paying it. The execution creditor would not be damnified, for he could not get paid without satisfying the landlord. Hence it became the practice for the sheriff to sell and to pay the landlord; and it was held that, if the sheriff sold without paying the

G landlord, the landlord, instead of bringing an action against the sheriff on the statute, might apply to the court for and obtain a rule—i.e., an order for payment out of the proceeds of sale—Henchett v. Kimpson (15); Arnitt v. Garnett (7). This mode of procedure became the common practice, and if the sheriff had notice of the landlord's claim before the proceeds of sale were parted with the landlord could, if in time, obtain payment out of the proceeds (Yates v. Ratledge (16)); and

H if too late he could sue the sheriff for removing the goods without paying him: Andrews v. Dixon (9). The right of the landlord to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale thus became recognised and established where no bankruptcy intervened.

(iii) Do the Bankruptcy Acts deprive the landlord of the right acquired in the manner above described? In one case we think they do, but only in one, viz., where the execution is itself overridden and rendered void by the bankruptcy and

I the landlord has not distrained: see Lee v. Lopes (17); Gethin v. Wilks (18). In the present case the execution is not overridden so as to make it and the sale under it invalid. Section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, is qualified by s. 46 (3) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [see now s. 1 (1) (e) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914], and the landlord was prevented by the execution from distraining. There is no provision in the Bankruptcy Acts which can deprive the sheriff of his right or the landlord of his unless it be s. 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. Sub-section (1) of that section does not apply, for the sale preceded the notice of the receiving order. But we are by no means satisfied that s. 11 (1), which is a general enactment, repeals the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1709, which is a special enactment applicable to a particular case. Section 11 (2), is the enactment which is relied upon in this case against the sheriff. But this section has not, in our opinion, rendered it wrong for him to pay the landlord that which the sheriff had a right to pay him for his own indemnity and that which the landlord had a right to have paid him in lieu of his right to sue under the Act of 1709. There is not a word in the sub-section which shows that the special case provided for by the Act of 1709 was being dealt with, and the concluding words of the clause tend strongly to show that it was not. The expression "goods of a debtor" is used, but there is nothing to show that the enactment applies to goods of a debtor which are subject to the rights of persons other than the execution debtor and execution creditor, and to override such rights.

The section deals with the rights of the execution creditor, the execution debtor, and the sheriff, when he has no legal duties to third parties; but the section is limited to ordinary cases of execution. Goods which belong to a judgment debtor, and are seized by the sheriff, but which are impounded by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1709, until the landlord is paid, are not "goods of a debtor" which have to be handed over by the sheriff to the trustee in bankruptcy under s. 11 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890. Nor are the proceeds of sale of such goods to be handed over free from the rights of the landlord or of the sheriff for his own indemnity. Even if the trustee in bankruptcy can require the sheriff to hand over the goods or proceeds, we see nothing to displace the right of the landlord under the Act of 1709 to have those goods kept unremoved or his right sanctioned by long practice to be paid out of the proceeds if they have been removed and sold contrary to the statute.

This was the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Appeal in Ireland in Re M'Carthy (1), and is in accordance with Duck v. Braddyll (19), if we understand that case rightly. The judgment in Re M'Carthy (1) really concludes this case, so far as an Irish decision can conclude an English one on similar Acts of Parliament. But as Re M'Carthy (1) is not technically binding on this court, we have thought it necessary to look into the authorities, and, having done so, we have come to the conclusion that that decision is in accordance with the English Bankruptcy Acts, and we follow it accordingly. It is said that Gethin v. Wilks (18) is opposed to this view. We can understand that case if the execution was over-reached by the bankruptcy so that the landlord could distrain, but it is unintelligible unless this were the case. The execution was clearly treated as void, and that is the explanation of the case. Lee v. Lopes (17) is open to the same observation, but, in addition, the landlord was the execution creditor, and had by issuing execution lost his right to distrain and the benefit of the statute.

The conclusion thus arrived at is in accordance with common sense. The trustee in bankruptcy claims the proceeds of the sale of the goods which have been properly sold only if the landlord is to be paid out of the proceeds—the trustee can only claim the benefit of the sale subject to those rights. The sheriff has paid the landlord, and is entitled to deduct the amount before he pays over the balance to the trustee. The appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.
